The earle of Huntley the same day before the battells ioined, gaue lands to the principall men of those surnames that were with him, as to the Forbesses, Melies, Jouings, Ogilues, Grants, and diuerse other. Which bountyfullnesse of the earle made them to fight more valiantlie. In recompense whereof the king gaue to the said earle the lands of Badzenot & Lochquhaber. In the meane time, Archembald Douglas earle of Murray burnt the peill of Straboggie, pertaining to the erle of Huntley, and haried the lands thereabouts. In reuenge whereof, the erle of Huntley at his returning backe, burnt & haried all the lands of the earldome of Murray. In the meane time, at a parlement holden at Edenburgh, the earle of Crawford was denounced a traitor, and all his lands and goods deemed to be forfeited into the kings hands. James earle of Douglas, James Lord Hamilton, the earles of Murray, and Dymont, the lord of Baluay, and manie other of that faction, were by publike proclamation made by an herald, commanded to appeare by a day to vnderlie the law. But in the next night that followed the day of this proclamation, certeine of the Douglasse servants that were sent priuie to Edenburgh, to vnderstand what was done there, fastened writings vpon the church doores, sealed with the Douglasse seale in this forme. The earle from henceforth will neither obeie citation, nor other commandement. Beside this, in the same writings, they charged the king with manie heinous crimes, calling him a murderer, perjured, false, and a bloudsucker.

The king therefore assembled an armie, and went forth against them: but because the time of the yere was contrarie to his purpose, he could do no great hurt to his enemies, although he burnt vp their corne, and droue awaie their cattell. But the Douglasse seemed to passe little for the kings malice, and the erle himselfe married his brothers wife the countesse Beatrice, & sent to Rome for a licence to haue that marriage made lawfull: but by the kings agents in that court, the earles suite might not be obtained. Wherefore he kept hir still in place of his wife, and continuing in rebellion against the king, the next spring, and for the more part of the tearme of two yeeres next ensuing, he haried and spoiled the kings possessions; and the king on the other part wasted Annandale, and all other the lands and possessions that belonged to the said earle of Douglas & his friends: but shortly after, as the king passed through Angus, to go into the north parts of the realme, the earle of Crawford came and submitted himselfe vnto him, craving mercie in most humble and lamentable wise, and obtained the kings pardon through mediation of James benedic bishop of saint Andrews, and sir William Creighton; but the said earle liued not past sir moneths after, departing this life by force of an hot ague in the yere 1454.

The same yere, the king called a parlement at Edenburgh, in the which James earle of Douglas, and his brothers wife the countesse Beatrice (whome he had taken to him by waie of a pretended & feined marriage) Archembald Douglas earle of Murray, George Douglas earle of Dymont, and John Douglas baron of Baluay, were forfeited & condemned of treason. The earldome of Murray was giuen to sir James Creighton, or rather restored to him from whome it had bene longfullie taken by the vniuersall sentence of William earle of Douglas, who had procured it to be assigned vnto his brother the said Archembald, though the right remained in the said sir James Creighton. But yet when the said sir James Creighton could not keepe that earldome without enuie of diuerse and sundrie persons, he handled the matter so, that shortly after it returned againe to the kings hands. Whereupon at this parlement, George Creighton was created erle of Cathness, & William Haie constable of Scotland was made earle of Erroll. There were also diuerse created lords of the parlement, whose titles were as follow: Darlie, Halls, Boid, Lile, and Lorne. After the breaking vp of the parlement, the king made a iourne against his aduersaries into Galloway, and with small adu brought all the castles of that countrie into his possession, and then turning into Douglasdale, because the inhabitants thereof would not obeie him, he abandoned the spoile thereof vnto his souldiours, who practised no small crueltie against the inhabitants.

Whereupon the Douglasse being diuised to their shifts, the lord James Hamilton of Cadzow was sent from them into England to sue for aid, but in vaine, for none there would be granted: whereupon returning to his friends, he counselled the earle of Douglas to trust to his owne forces; and sith the same were farre superior in number of men to the kings power, he gaue likewise counsell without delay, to set vpon the king, that the matter might be tried by chance of battell, the onelie meane to assure them of their liues and estates, for otherwise he saw not how anie vnfeined agreement might be concluded, the matter being now passed so farre forth to an extremitie. But the earle of Douglas offerlie (as some write) refused to fight against his soueraigne and true liege lord, if any other meane might be found. Whereupon diuerse great lords which were with him there on his side, being men of great wit, and no lesse experience, aduised him yet to keepe together his host, till by their trauell and assistance a peace were concluded, and pardon obtained for all parts: for if the armie were once broken vp, all hope was then past (as they alledged) for anie indifferent conditions

Herewith also, the lord Hamilton being wiser than the rest, had the Dowglas fidelewell, and so departed, concluding that he should never see so faire a day againe, therein he might haue cast the dice for the whole kingdome. And being thus departed from the Dowglas, he repaired to the king as then lying at the siege of Abircorne, who sent him to the castell of Roselaine, there to remaine under safe keeping with the earle of Orkente, to whom the said castell belonged: but at length, the king did not onlie pardon the lord Hamilton of all passed offenses, but also receiued him into such fauor, that he gaue him his eldest daughter in marriage, as after shall appeare. But now vpon the withdrawing thus of the said lord Hamilton from the Dowglas, because the king had set forth an open proclamation of pardon to all those that would forsake the earle of Dowglas, the most part of the same earles compaignie departed from him, by reason whereof he fled into England, together with his brethren. The king lying at the siege of Abircorne, lost diuerse of his men, besides manie that were wounded; but yet taking first a strong tower, being one of the chiefest finnes of that fortresse, shortly after hee wan the rest.

The earle of Dowglas being withdraue (as yee haue heard) into England, within a while after got together certeine companies of men, and with the same returned againe into Scotland by the west borders, in hope to find friends in those parties: but such as the king had appointed there to defend the countrie, assembling themselues together, and setting vpon him, discomfited his people, slue his brother Archembald, and toke the erle of Dumont prisoner, being first sore wounded. The baron of Baluay escaped into a wood, and so got alyue. The earle himselfe also (as Hector Boetius saith) escaped by flight, and got vnto Dunstaffage, where finding Donald earle of Ross and lord of the Isles, he procured him (being of nature inclined and readie inough to follow such counsell) to make warre in his fauour against the king. And after he had once let him on worke, he got him backe againe into England. Donald wasted not onelie the kings possessions that lay nere to Dunstaffage, but also passing through Argyle, did much hurt in all places where he came. He inuaded also the Ile of Arrane, and chased the bishop of Lismore, constraining him to take sanctuary. This done, he entered into Lochgabair, & so into Murray land, where he burnt the towne of Inuerness, and wan the castell by a guilefull traine.

In the meane time, the earle of Dumont after he was recovered of his hurts (as the said Boetius writeth) was presented to the king, and after he had remained in prison a certeine time, he was at length beheaded. Moreover the countesse Beatrice, after she saw no hope left that the earle of Dowglas should recover his former estate, came to the king, and submitted herselfe, laiting all the blame in the earle, who had procured hir vnto such vnlawfull marriage with him, being hir former husbands brother. The king receiued hir right courteously, and gaue to hir the baronie of Baluay, to mainteine therewith hir estate. Shortly after also the countesse of Roselaine fled from hir husband, & came to the king for feare of hir husbands crueltie, wherof partlie she had alreadye tasted. The king because he had made the marriage betwixt hir and hir husband, assigned hir forth sufficient reuenues also for the maintenance of hir estate. About the same time Patrike Thoznton one of the kings seruants, but a fauourer of the Dowglas, slue John Sandlands of Calder the kings cousine, and Alane Stewart at Dunbretton, so that they added the contrarie faction: but the king getting the latter into his hands, caused him and his complices to die for their wicked offense committed. The vniuersitie of Glasgow was founded about this tyme by and within, bishop of that see. In the yere following, died William Hare earle of Erroll, and constable of Scotland: also George Creichon earle of Carnes, and William Creichon chiefe of that familie.

In this meane while, the earle of Dowglas remaining in England, procured the Englishmen diuers times to make rodes into Scotland, wherby he lost (as the Scottish writers affirme) the loue of his owne countremen, when they saw him thus ioine with the Englishmen; to the damage of his native land. At one time, Henrie earle of Northumberland, and the said earle of Dowglas inuaded the Pers, but taking little heed to themselves, and suffering their people to ride abrode to harie the countrie without order; Dowglas earle of Angus with a mightie armie of Scottishmen set vpon them, and put them to flight, sleaing diuers, and taking to the number of seuen hundred prisoners. Thus (as should appeare) the earle of Dowglas in vaine sought to disquiet his countrie, for all his friends in Scotland continued faithfull to the king, who had granted peace to all other of the Dowglas and their complices: for it was Gods will the matter should be taken vp without more bloodshed, that the right line of the Scottish kings might be preferred. [For (as it appeareth) he was amongst the English inuading Scotland, subdued and taken by the barons Johnston and Colpull, who presented him vnto the king, wherupon the king after a sort banished him into the monastirie of Lendoze, where he was bountifullie and honorable receiued (according to his nobilitie) of the religious persons, in which place he liued manie yeres, and then died.]

And though the almighty God might haue brought that to passe by other meanes, according as it should haue pleased his good will and omnipotent power; yet he chose this way, whereby the effusion of much blood might be avoided, which by still battell had bene spilled, if the parties hauing their hearts filled with rancor & ire, had buckled together in battell. But the king, vnto the aduise of his kinsman James Benedie archbishop of S. Andrews, compassed his purpose in the end, dispatching out of the way such as he anie waies forth mistrusted, of which number namelie were the Dowglas, whose puissance and authoritie not without cause he euermore suspected. Many haue reported (as before is said) that in the beginning king James the second, though feare of the great power of these Dowglas, was in mind to haue fled the realme, but being recomforted by the counsell and authoritie of the said bishop James Benedie, he aduanced his studie to matters of greater importance.

The said Benedie turned the earle of Angus, being of the surname of the Dowglas, and brother to him by his mother, to take part with the king. He procured also diuers other of the same blood and surname, to revolt from the other confederats, and to submit themselues vpon promise of pardon vnto the kings mercie; and so infolding the forces of such as were aduersaries to the king, in the end he had them all at his pleasure. It was thought, that forso much as the Dowglas had their lands lying so vpon the west and middle marches of the realme, (that no man might beare anie rule in those parts, but onelie they themselues) if they had happlie joined with the Englishmen, considering the great intelligence betwixt them, which they had in all other parts of the realme, that by kinned and alliance, the realme might might haue fallen into great perill: for trulie it is a dangerous thing (as Io. Maior saith) for the estate of a realme to haue men of great power and authoritie inhabiting on the borders and vitermost parts thereof. For if they chance (vpon anie occasion giuen) to renounce their obedience to their naturall prince & supreme gouernor, the prejudice may be great and irrecoverable, that oftentimes thereof insurth; as well appeareth in the earles of March, and other before mentioned in this historie: and likewise in France by the duke of Burgognie, Britaine, and Normandie: for till those countries were incorporated and annexed vnto the crowne of France, the kings of that realme were oftentimes put to great hinderance through rebellion by them, whome they accounted for their subiects.

But now to returne where I left. After the Dowglas was once dispatched, and things quieted, King James the second began then to reigne and rule reallie, not doubting the controlment of anie other person. For then he ordeined lawes for his people as seemed best to his liking, commanding the same to be kept vnder great penalties and forfeitures. And being counseled chieflie by the bishop of saint Andrews, James Benedicte that was his vncle, and the earle of Arkenie, he passed through all the parts of his realme, granting a generall pardon of all offenses passed. And so he ruled and gouerned his subiects in great quietnesse, and caused iustice to dwelle to be ministered on all sides, that it was said in his daies, how he caused the rath bush to keepe the cow.

In the yere 1455, the king held a parlement, in which were manie good lawes made and established for the weale of all the realme, as in the booke of the acts of parlement is contained. He used the matter also in such wise with the principall capitaines of the Isles, and of the hie lands, that the same were as quietlie gouerned, as anie part of the low lands, shewing all obedience as well in paying such duties as they owed to the king for their lands, as also in readinesse to serue in the warres with great companies of men, as became them to do: speciallie Donald lord of the Isles and earle of Ross, who had before joined himselfe in confederacie with the earles of Douglas and Crawford against the king, and had taken into his hands the kings house, and castell of Inuernesse (as before ye haue heard) naming himselfe king of the Isles.

Nevertheless, he was now at length reconciled to the king, and gaue pledges for his good demeanour, and afterwards brought to the king three thousand men in aid at the siege of Roxburgh, whose reconciliation was after this maner. When this Donald perceived aduerser fortune to besiege him on euerie side, he sent messengers to the king, craving peace and pardon for himselfe and for his offenses. When comming before the king (and with manie humble speeches, remembering the manie parts of clemencie which the king had used to the earle of Crawford, and such as followed his faction) they did so purge the fault of Donald (by transferring the same to the fatall rage and iniurie of the present times, and by promising in his behalfe that hereafter he should liue most quietlie in dutifull obedience) that they moued the kings mind to haue compassion vpon him.

But yet the king answered in a meane sort betwene both, not vterlie pardoning, nor flatlie reflecting him: for (saith he) there be yet manie shewes extant of his wickednesse, and he hath not giuen forth anie one token of a changed mind. Wherefore, to the end that we may beleue the same to be true (which you haue promised in his behalfe) hereafter to become a dutifull subiect and louing neighbour to vs, and to those which are about him, he must with repentance (proceeding from an vnfeined tong) craue pardon from vs whome he hath grauoullie offended, and (with sufficient restitution) recompense those whome (by wronging) he hath injured: besides which also, he must with some worthy exploit wipe awaie the memory and blot of all his former committed wickednes. And although I well know that no vertue doth moze besmeare a kinglie maiestie than clemencie, yet we ought so to provide, that (measuring all things by the line of reason) the wicked war not so proud and rebellious (by ouermuch lenitie and losse gouernement) as the god may be excited to the honest performance of their dutie by fauour and iustice. Wherefore I will inioine a time to Donald, and the rest of his associates, wherein they may openlie shew some deeds of an altered disposition, and from henceforth we will so account of him, as his works and not his words shall iustifie him to be. But in the meane time, I will him to rest in quiet, leaving it in the power of him and his, whether he, and they, will hereafter be accounted (by due deserts) happie or miserable. Which said, the messengers departed, and Donald rested satisfied.)

In the meane while great dissention rose in England betwene the two houses of Lancaster & Yorke; the king being principall of the house of Lancaster, was taken himselfe at the battell of saint Albons. But the queene with hir sonne the prince, and Henrie the yong duke of Summerset, with diuers other fled into the north parts of England, and sent to the king of Scotland to desire him of aid, who vpon good aduise taken with his counsell, for that king Henrie had euer kept well the peace with the realme of Scotland, and also for reuenge of his vncle the duke of Summerset his death, prepared an armie of twentie thousand men to passe into England: and in the meane time all the north parts of England, hearing that king James was ready to support the queene of England, joined with hir, and passed forward into the south parts, constraining the duke of Yorke to flee the realme, and so king Henrie intored the gouernement of his realme againe, and for that time concluded an agreement with the duke of Yorke his aduersarie, which lasted not long.

The duke of Yorke remembering how ready king James was to prepare an armie in support of his aduersarie king Henrie, procured the borderers to make incursions vpon the Scottish subiects, & would suffer no rebelle to be had, nor daies of truce to be kept on the borders, as in time of peace the custome was. Whereupon king James raised a power, and in person entered with the same into England, doing great hurt by destroing diuers towne, castles and peiles in Northumberland, the bishoprike and other parts, till at length vpon faire promises made by the Englishmen, he returned into his owne country. [At this time, the art of printing was first invented in the citie of Mentz in Germanie, but whether to great commoditie or discommoditie of learning, I leaue to the iudgement of others, saith Lescus.]

After this, king Henrie of England, perceiving that the duke of Yorke by the counsell of the earle of Warwick, ceased not to practise conspiracies against him, sent estones to king James, requiring him of aid against them, and promised therefore to restore vnto the king of Scotland the lands in Northumberland, Cumberland, the bishoprike of Durham, and such like, which the kings of Scotland had held before. This offer was accepted, and by treaties and contracts accorded, sealed, and interchanged betwixt the two princes (as the Scottishmen alledge.) desire to support his against the house of Poike, king James with a great armie entered England, but after that the queene in the meane time had slaine the duke of Poike, & got the upper hand of his enemies, at the same queenes request, he retired into Scotland againe. Nevertheless shortly after, when the earles of March and Marwick sought still to mainteine their quarrell against the queene of England, she was constrained to withdraue into the north parts, and to desire king James to approach closenes with his armie vnto the borders: which he did, meaning to win the castles of Rockburgh and Marke, which were amongst other things promised to be deliuered vnto him by king Henrie, and so comming to Rockburgh, laied his armie round about that castle, and planted his siege in full warlike manner.

Where the king hauing great experience in knowledge of shooting great artillerie, departed from his campe, accompanied with the earle of Angus, and others, and came to the trenches where the great ordinance was planted, which he caused to be shot off. And here by great misfortune, this worthy prince James the second, was slaine by the slice of a great peece of artillerie, which by ouercharging chanced to breake, and slue not onelie the king standing somewhat nere it, but also hurt the earle of Angus, with other: being a notable president from henceforth, how such great princes approach so nere within danger of such peeces of ordinance, when they are shot off. He was thus killed the thirde day of August, in the yere of his life 29, of his reigne 24, and after the incarnation 1460. His bodie was buried with all funerall obsequies according to his estate, within the monasterie of Holie rood house at Edinburgh, the people generallie lamenting his death with no lesse sorrow and dolefull mone, than as is seene in a priuat house for the decesse of the welbeloued master and owner thereof.

In time of warre, amongst his subjects in the campe, he behaved himselfe so gentlie towards all men, that they seemed not to feare him as their king, but to reuerence & loue him like a father. He would ride vp and downe amongst them, and eat & drinke with them, euen as he had bene fellowlike with the meanest. He had issue by his wife queene Marie three sonnes, and two daughters. His eldest sonne named James, succeeded him in the kingdome; the second named Alexander, was created duke of Albanie; and his third sonne called John, was made earle of Mar. The eldest of his daughters the Hamilton had in marriage (as before is said) and also after shall be mentioned.

* All the time of the reigne of this king, christian religion did greatlie flourish amongst the Scots: for there were amongst them twelue notable and famous bishops, whereof the chiefest were James Kennedy bishop of saint Andriwes, Carnebull bishop of Glasgou, Thomas Spenser bishop of Aberdeen, and Henrie Lichon bishop of Murray. At what time likewise there were manie religious abbats that kept such great houses, as both the nobilitie and communalitie traouelling through out the kingdome, did neuer almost lodge in ante publicke hosterie, but in the monasteries: which were neuer vered or spoiled, during the time of the ciuill warres of the kingdome. Beside these men of eminent learning, there flourished also Nicholas Widdone, and John Eldmaire, singular diuines, with manie other doctors laudable seene in all kind of learning. In the reigne of which king also, Charles the 7, king of France, for singular service done vnto him by the Scots, in the warres (betweene the English and the French) did honorable indowmant of the Scots (for recompense thereof) with manie rich possessions in quitaine, who by that meanes (settling themselves in that countrie) were the originall of manie worthie families of that prouince, amongst which is that famous kintred of Calbell de la Campana in Tolouse, at this time greatlie flourishing, which had his beginning from Calbell a thane (or baron) being knight in the north parts of Scotland: for the grandfather of him which is now liuing, head of that house did insoy the place of magistrat or ruler of the Capitolline in that citie, hauing that title confirmed to his posteritie. This mans sonne Peter Calbell being a senator in the high court of Tolouse (commonlie called the parlement) was for his singular learning and wisdom had in great honoz of all men during his life, which stretched to extreme age. In whose place came John (the eldest sonne of the said Peter) who both at this day possesse the roome of his father, as a senator of the said court of Tolouse. And his other children with great honoz are indued with other offices of gouernement in the said citie.)

Some strange sights there appeared before the death of this king James the second: for the day before he was slaine, a blazing star was plainlie seene, which signified (as was thought) the death of the said king. In the yere before the siege, there was in Dundee an herimophodyt, that is, a person with both shapen, but esteemed for a woman onelie, till it was proued, that lieng with his maisters daughter night where she dwelt, she had got the young damsell with child; for the which act, because she had counterfeited hir selfe a woman, and yet had wrought the part of a man, she was condemned to be buried quicke, and suffered according to that iudgement. At the same time, there was a certelie these, that with his familie liued apart from the companie of men, remaining secretlie within a den in Angus called Fenisden, who vsed to kill young persons, and to feed on their flesh, for the which abhominable offense, being apprehended with his wife and all his familie, they were burnt to death. One of his daughters that was scarce twelue moneths of age, onelie excepted, the which being preserved and brought vp in Dundee, before she came to the age of twelue yeres, she was taken in the like crime for the which her father died, whereupon she was iudged to be buried quicke: and going to execution, when the people in great multitudes followed hir, in wondering at so horrible an offense committed by one of hir age and sexe, she turned to them that thus detested hir wicked doing, and with a countenance representing hir cruel inclination, said to them: What need you thus to raile vpon me, as if I had done an heinous act contrary to the nature of man? I tell you, that if you knew how pleasant mans flesh is in taste, there would none of you all forbear to eat it. And thus with an impenitent and stubborne mind she suffered the appointed execution.

After the death of James the second, his sonne James the third a child of seuen yeres of age succeeded, and forthwith was sent for to the siege of Rockburgh, whither he was conuited by the queene, a woman of a stout stomach, representing the manlike race of his countrie Gelderland, of the which she was descended. For comming with his sonne thus to the siege, she spent not time in lamenting and womanish bewailing the irrecoverable losse of his husband, but rather in comforting the lords, whose part had bin to haue comforted hir: and about all things she exhorted them with all diligence to imploye their whole indowments and forces to the winning of that castle. Whose words so encouraged the capteins and whole armie, that the siege was continued till the castle was wone, rased, and beaten downe flat to the ground: and the young king was crowned at at Kelso, with the vniuersall consent and great re-

This done, they besieged the castell of Warke, which likewise they took, and threwe downe, and af-came to Edinburgh, to take order for the quiet go-James Benedie bishop of S. Andrews, that was sisters sonne to James the first, the bishop of Glas-cote, the earles of Angus, Huntlie, Argile, and Dukeneie. These, so long as James Benedie lived, agreed well together about the gouernement of the realme; but within a while after his deceasse, they fell at square, or rather before, as appeareth by Hector Boetius, who saith, that in the second yere of this kings reigne, there was discord in biewing betwixt the queene and the archbishop Benedie, who perceiuing that the woman sought to vsurpe wholie the gouernement vnto hir selfe, withstood hir in that behalf, in so much that it was doubted least the matter would haue broken forth into some ciuill warre, if the bishops of Glasgote, Dunkeld, and Aberden, and certeine abbats had not taken in hand to trauell betwixt the parties for an attonement, who did so much in the matter, that they compounded the variance in this wise.

The queene mother was appointed to haue the charge of the kings person, and of his brethren, Alexander duke of Albanie, and John earle of Mar, and likewise of his two sisters; but as for the administration and gouernance of the realme, the should leaue it vnto the peres. There were therefore elected by common consent as rulers, the bishops of Glasgote and Dunkeld, the earle of Dukeneie, the lord Graham, Thomas Boid, and the chancelor. About the same time, one Alane Beir, in hope to get the heritage of his brother, John lord of Lozne took him, and kept him in prison. But Colen Campbell earle of Argile, taking great indignation with so prosumptuous a part, gathered a power, and comming against Beir, took him, and set his brother at liber-tie, and brought the offendor vnto Edinburgh, where he died in prison. Moreover, shortly after Donald lord of the Fles and earle of Kossle, who had serued obedientlie in the armie at Roxburgh, and was (as outwardlie appeared) well reconciled, began aneie to vse his old maners, spoiling & harrieng the whole countrie of Atholl, and took the earle thereof, and the countesse his wife captiues with him into the Fles.

To repress his inturious attempts, the regents together were preparing an armie; but therewith came true aduertisements, that the said lord of the Fles, and other the principall offendors of his com-panie, were stricken through the hand of God with a certeine frensie or madnesse, and had lost all their ships and spoiles in the sea, so that the earle of Atholl and his ladie were ressozed, and those frantike persons were brought vnto saint Wides church in Atholl, for the reuerie of their health, but it would not be. Donald himselfe was afterward slaine in the castell of Inuernes by an Irishman that was a minstrell. In the yere 1461, Henrie the first king of England being vanquished by his aduersarie Edward the fourth, purchased of king James the third a safe conduct for himselfe and a thousand horse to enter into Scotland; and hereupon he came to Edinburgh, and was lodged in the house of the friers preachers, with his wife queene Margaret, and his sonne prince Edward. There was also with him the duke of Excester, and the duke of Summerfet, with manie other of the English nobilitie.

* And to the end this firme amitie thus begun, might more increase, and be further strengthened: the two queenes Margaret (of England) and Marie (of Scotland) both French (by birth and nature) began to intreat of a mariage (hoping by amitie to establissh that perfect amitie) to be solemnized betweene the daughter of James the second king of Scots, and the sonne of Henrie (king of England) being called prince of Wales, although none of them as yet was aboue seven yeaes old. Which mariage, Philip duke of Burgognie (uncle to the queene of Scots, and deable enemie to the queene of England) labored by all means to hinder, by his ambassador Cruthusius, a noble man and of great iudgement; for this Philip did vse such bitter enimi-tie against Reinold, grandfather to the son of king Henrie by the mothers side, that he did depelie enuie anie good successe to happen to anie of that race, whereby it might increase or florish; and therefore sought occasion by all deuise to hinder it: for whose cause, and at whose request, the said mariage was at that time rather deferred, than vtterlie broken off.
But the end thereof (which was greatlie feared by this Philip to be the consummation of the mariage) was by the aduerser fortune of king Henrie vtterlie disappointed. For (as after shall appeare) this Henrie being incouraged (by the benenolence of the Scots towards him) and throughtlie confirmed (by the letters of his friend sent vnto him) dispatched his wife into France to Reinold his father, to procure what aid he coulde of his friends beyond the seas, to helpe to restore him to the kingdome: which iourneie succeeded not to hir in vaine, obtaining succor from thence.)

The same time, king Henrie deliuered the towne & castell of Berwik into the Scottishmens hands, whether by couenant thereby to haue the foresaid safe conduct granted, or of his own voluntarie will, to the end he might haue the more support and fauor amongest them, it is vncerteine by the variable report of writers. Neuerthelesse, shortly after a truce was taken betwixt king James and king Edward, for the tearme of fiftene yeaes, vpon what conditions or promises made on king Edwards part I find not. This truce was concluded in the moneth of Maie, in the yere 1462, at the citie of Poike, whither had bin sent the bishop of Glasgote, the earle of Argile, keeper of the priue seale, the abbat of Ho-lie rood house, sir Alexander Boid, and sir William Crawfson knights, ambassadors and commissioners for king James.

All things in this season were ordered in Scotland by the aduise and counsell of James Benedie bishop of saint Andrews, a man of great wisdom and policie, as well appeared in his prudent & sage gouernement of the realme, as well during the mi-noritie of this James the third, as also in the daies of his father king James the second. Pierre de Breze, otherwise called le Seigneur de la Warrenne, great seneschall of Normandie, was sent by the French king Lewes the eleuenth, with two thousand fighting men, to aid the part of king Henrie against king Edward. This Breze was one most in fauour with king Charles the seventh, father vnto the said king Lewes, and therefore (as manie did suppose) he was appointed by k. Lewes (who greatlie loued him not) to be chiefe in this iourneie, to the end his life might be put in hazard both of tempest on the sea, and also of the enemies hands, he wan the castels of Wamburgh and Dunstanburgh, which he cast to the ground, and after took in hand to keepe the castell of Anwik, and being besieged therein

Scotland: the English armie that lay there at siege beholding the maner, and not once making profer to fight with him. Some Englishmen there were, that would faine haue fought with the Scots; but other (whose counsell was followed) were otherwise mindeed, alleging that better it were to let them passe without encounter, sith they left the castell void, than to leoparde upon the doubtfull chance of battell, for though their number were not great, yet were they piked and chosen men, able to atchieue a great enter-

After this, the firste of Nouember, in the yeare 1463, the queene of Scots, mother to James the third, died at Edenburgh, and was buried in the college of the Trinitie, which the hir selfe had founded. This woman, after the deceasse of hir husband James the second, liued somewhat dissolutelie, procuring Adam Hepburne of Hales a married man to keepe hir such familiar companie, as sounded great-lie to hir dishonor: for that she could not with in the whole realme find some single man amongst all the nobilitie, with whome she might haue married, & in some sort to haue auoided the greater open slander & infamie. In the same yeare, Alexander duke of Al-banie, and brother to the king, was taken on the sea by the Englishmen in the moneth of June, as he was returning from his grandfather the duke of Gilder: but the bishop of saint Andrewes James Benedie, caused both the said duke and also the ship, with all the goods there in being, at the time of the taking of it, to be restored; for otherwise (as he flat-lie protested) he would not keepe the truce anie longer concluded betwixt the two realmes.

The duke of Summerfet, in hope of great fauor which he should find in England, perswaded king Henrie to passe thither, and with a great companie of Scottishmen he entered England, and manie of the north parts resorted vnto him: but at length, at his comming to Gram, the lord Montacute with a great power was readie to giue him battell, and there discomfited him and his whole armie. The duke of Summerfet and the lords Hungerford and Kosse were taken and put to death; the duke at Gram, and the lords at Newcastell. King Henrie escaped verie hardlie into Scotland againe, and there remained a certeine space after, till at length he thought to returne into England in such secret wise, as he should not haue bene once knowen, till he might haue got amongest his friends, which would haue supported him: but such diligent watch was laid for him all alongst the borders, that he was espied, taken, and deliuered to king Edward his aduersarie, who shut him vp in the tower of London till he was at length there made away, as in the historie of England ye may see moze at large.

In the yeare 1466, that famous bishop James Benedie departed this life, and was buried in the college of saint Sauour, founded by him within the towne of saint Andrewes in most sumptuous wise. This prelat in prudent policie excelled all other Scottish bishops, of whome anie writer maketh mention. He kept the realme in good quiet, and obserued the truce concluded with the Englishmen, to the great weale and commoditie of the poore commons. He was verie rich, as appeared by sundrie buildings and works which he left behind him, as a memorie of his name. [Whereof the three especial things for rarenesse and magnificence, were his college of saint Sauour (wherein youth might be trained to learning and religion) the other his sepulchre, wherein he was buried (being a statelie peece of worke, such as before had not bene accustomed for bishops of Scotland) & the third was a ship of won-derfull burden: all which three, the common people affirmed were of one price, and stood him in like charge.] Besides his bishopricke, he held in his hands the commandarie of the abbete of Pettinweme, which was worth vnto him eight hundred crowns by yeare. [Afterward, at the parliament holden in October and Ianuarie, there were manie edicts made for the benefit of the commonwealth, & chiefe-lie for the estate of the merchants; at what time also there was a proclamation made, that none of the Englishmen should beare anie office, nor receiue anie benefice or benefit in Scotland.]

In the yeare 1469, on the tenth day of Iulie, king James the third, being as then about twentie yeares of age, married in the abbete of Holie rood house nere Edenburgh, the lady Margarete, daughter to the king of Denmarke and Poiswale, which lady was at the same time not past twelue yeares of age, some saie sixtene. Hir father the king of Denmarke and Poiswale, in name of hir dower, transported and resigned to B. James all his right, title, and interest which he pretended to the out Isles.
The ambassadores that were sent into Denmarke to conclude this marriage, and to conueie the bride into Scotland, were these: Andzew Wudair bishop of Glasgow, the bishop of Moray, the lord Auandale chancelor of Scotland, and Thomas Woid earle of Arrane, who had married the kings sister, and was now in his absence run into the kings displeasure; whereof his wife having intelligence, bearing of hir husbands arrivall with the other in the North, got out of Edenburgh, & comming on shipboard to him, gaue him to vnderstand what displeasure the king had conceived against him: who perceiuing himselfe in that danger he stood if he toke land, returned backe into Denmarke, taking his wife with him.

The king herewith was so offended, that he caused both the said earle and his father to be attainted of high treason, and sent for his sister backe into Scotland, causing a diuorce in absence of hir husband to be sued, & gotten forth against them, marieng hir afterwards to James lord Hamilton, to whome he gaue the earldome of Arrane, which hir former husband had in gift before. Of this marriage, those of the house of Hamiltons are descended, & are nearest of blood to the crowne of Scotland, as they pretend.
[For as saith Lesleus, lib. 8. pag. 316] if the line of the Stewards faile, the crowne is to come to them.] But now to shew further what we find written concerning the maner and cause of the banishment of the afore remembred Thomas Woid, Giouan Ferre-rio, in his appendix of the Scottish historie annexed vnto Hector Boetius lastlie printed at Paris in the yeare 1574, agreeth not with that which ye haue red before. For as he telleth the tale, the said lord Woid being one of the gouernours of the realme, elected thereto (as before ye haue heard) within short time grewe so far in fauor with the king, that he might do all things with him at his pleasure, although his as-sociats in authoritie did neuer so much go about to hinder his deuises: by reason whereof, he seemed to vsurpe the whole rule & administration of the realme into his owne hands, soze to the griefe of those his said associats being ioined with him in like office.

Whereof the state of the common-wealth through the dissention thus bred among the gouernours, was brought into a miserable plight; for suffice in most places wanted his due course, so as thieves and robbers taking boldness thereof, not onely upon the borders, but also elsewhere, began to exercise great outrage, to the breach of publicke peace, and navellie the inhabitants of the out-yles fell to their wonted trade of pillering; so that passing over in their long boats or barges, and landing here & there on the shore, they took prizes of cattell and other goods, & carrie to their coast, and no lesse damage of the people that inhabited on the coasts, upon the going thence, in the north parts also, seditions for ought among the nobles, gentlemen, and people were raised, to the great dishonouring of the whole countrey. Such disorders continued no small time, and because the said Thomas lord Borth was greivously abused touching the blame of this commonlie hap, which was imputed to him, and his goods, and in length of time the king was obliged to give peace, and able to see the sad situation of the common-wealth himselfe, he was admonished by certain estatemen, personages, who had some regard, that he should send some knight to the whole state of the realm, might have the right of the whole called a parliament, in the which, whether through envie that the lords had conceived against Thomas Borth, or that his wrongs and his defence, such complaint was exhibited by generall wordes of the state against him; that it was decreed by the whole assemblee, that he should come to answer for judgement such crimes whereunto he was charged; but when he refused to tread, and in contempt of the kings authority got together a power of armed men to defend him from injurie; that might seeme (as he pretended) to be offered him at length, the king was driven of necessity to make preparation for the denying of assistance to apprehend him by force. Whereof Borth being advertised fled into England, because he perceived himselfe not able to resist the kings power. The king assured that he was thus avoided out of his realme, banished him forever, and seized upon his lands and goods as forfeited.

After this, when the said Borth saw no hope to returne againe into the kings fauor, and finding no great comfort among the Englishmen, he passed from thence into Denmarke, where he remained till the marriage was concluded betwixt the king and the ladie Margaret, daughter to the king of Denmarke, as ye before have heard: and then in hope by occasion of this marriage to obtaine pardon, returned againe in companie of the bride, and of those ambassadors that were sent to have the countenance of him into Scotland: nevertheless, understanding by his wife that came to him on shipboard before he set foot on land, that the kings displeasure continued still towards him so greivous, that if he came on land, he should be sure to lose his head, he returned into Denmarke, and took his wife with him; as before is mentioned. Finally he went into Italie, where at length he was murdered by one, whose wife he went about to allure for the satisfieng of his sensuall lust. Before he was divorced from his wife the kings sister; he begat on her a sonne, the which in the daies of king James the fourth, in a privat quarrell that rose betwixt him and an other noble man, chanced to be slaine. Thus much touching the lord Thomas Borth of Kilmarnocke out of Ferrerio, who also in report of the matter touching the marriage betwixt the king and the daughter of Denmarke, somewhat varieth from an other that writ thereof.

The ambassadors that were sent unto Christierne king of Denmarke & Norwaie in the yeare 1468, as the said Ferrerio affirmeth, were these; Andrew bishop of Glasgow, William bishop of Orkney, Andrew lord of Anandale chancelor of the realme, Martine Blane the great almoner, & the kings confessor, Gilbert de Keriche archdeacon of Glasgow, David Creighton of Crauford, & John Shaw of Parke. These ambassadors being dispatched into Denmarke in Julie, in the yeare aforesaid, came at length to Haffien, where is Christierne then resident, and were of him iustlicie receiued, & well heard concerning their sute, in so much at length after he had proponed the matter to his counsell about the eight of September, it was agreed in this sort, that the ladie Margaret, daughter to the said king Christierne, should be given in marriage unto James of Scotland, and that the fles of Orkney, being situated betwixt us, and likewise the fles of Shetland, of which there are righte, should remaine in possession of the kings of Scotland, whether the said king Christierne or his successors in name of the marriage should pay unto king James, or to his successors, the summe of six thousand florens of the shilling. This marriage was thought, by reason of this ingaging of those fles, right profitably unto the realme of Scotland, because of the controuersie and variance which had continued long before those daies betwixt the kings of Scotland and Denmarke, about the right of possessing those fles.

In the month of November next ensuing, after the marriage had bene consummate in Julie before, within the abbey church of Holy rood house (as before ye have heard) in saint Giles church in Edinburgh (as otherwaite the three estates were called to assemble in Edinburgh), where the quene was crowned, and the parliament holden, the most part of the lords remaining still in Edinburgh all the next winter: and in the summer following, the king and quene made their progresse into the north parts, and were honorablie receiued in the principall cities and townes where they came; and likewise by the nobles of the countrey, to the great reioysing of the whole realme. After their returning to Edinburgh, the king called a parliament in the month of Maie 1471, in the which among other things it was decreed, that the lords, barons, and burroughs of the realme, should build ships and boats, and provide nets for fishing. Also it was ordained that none should weare silke in dublet, gowne, or cloake, except knights, knights, & heralds; except they might spend one hundred pounds in lands by year, and that the football and other vnlawfull games should be debarr'd, and the exercise of shooting maintained. James eldest sonne to king James the third, was borne the tenth day of March, in the yeare 1472, who afterwards succeeded his father, and was called James the fourth. Christierne is of Denmarke, to congratulate the happy birth of this young prince being his nephew by his daughter, released all the right, title & claime which he or his successors might haue to the fles of Orkney and Shetland.

A strange comet or blasing starre (as we call it) appeared in the south, from the seventeenth day of Iannarie, unto the eighteenth of Februarie, and was placed betwixt the pole and the pleiades; that is to say, the seven starres. A great ship built by Benedict the late archbishop of saint Andrews, called the bishopps barge, brake and was lost beside Banburgh, being fraught with merchandize, the twelfth of March. Many merchantmens seruants and other passengers were drowned with her, some escaped by boat, and were taken by the Englishmen, among whom was the abbat of saint Colme, who was constrained to pay unto his taker one James Bar four score pounds for his rancome, yet he could be suffered to depart. 1474.

This yere in September, the indulgence of the see of saint Andrews was published by Patrike Graham bishop thereof, and the same erected into the dignitie of an archbishops see, at the sute of the said Patrike, who gaue information to the pope, that because the archbishop of Dork was metropolitan of Scotland, and that there was oftentimes warre betwixt the realmes of England and Scotland, the Scottishmen could not haue access to their metropolitan, spectallie in cases of appellation. And therefore the pope (as some write) thought it reason to make saint Andrews primat and metropolitan of Scotland, and ordeined that the twelue other bishops of Scotland should be vnder his primasie, who would not agree thereto; but promised the king by way of a taxation eleven thousand marks for his maintenance against the said archbishop: and the prelates sent to Rome about this matter. This yere was a great death in the realme of Scotland, so that where a parliament was called in September, it was proroged untill the twelue day after Christmas. In Januarie the parliament was holden at Edinburgh, in which John lord of the Isles and earle of Ross was atteinted, partly for his owne euill deeds, but most speciallie for the defaults of his father Donald lord of the Isles.

The earle of Crawford was made admerall of the armie by sea, and the erle of Atholl the kings vnckle by his father was lieutenant of the armie by land. But such meanes was used by the earle of Atholl, that the lord of the Isles humbled himselfe to the kings pleasure, vpon certeine conditions; and thereupon in the beginning of Iulie next ensuing, the said lord of the Isles came to the parlement vnto Edinburgh, and there was the agreement made and confirmed betwixt the king and him: he resigned into the kings hands all the right he had to the earldome of Ross, the lands of Cantire and Anapden, which earldome the king annexed to the crowne, and pardoned him and his seruants of all offenses and transgressions before that day committed, and inuested him anew in the lordship and seigniorie of the Isles, and other his lands not released, to hold the same of the king by the seruice of ward and reliefe. The king also gaue vnto the earle of Atholl for his diligence shewed, in reducing the said lord of the Isles vnto order, the lands and forrest of Clouie.

There was an inquisitor called Husman this yere sent by pope Sixtus into Scotland, to examine by vertue of his commission Patrike Graham archbishop of saint Andrews, whose examination and proses being sent vnto the pope, he pronounced him an heretike, schismaticke, and simoniacke, and declared him accursed, condemning him to perpetuall prison: and so he was degraded from all orders, cure, and dignitie of ecclesiasticall office, and William Schewes archdeacon of the same see was promoted in his place, to whome he was also committed to see him safelie kept in prison. He was first sent vnto saint Colmes inch, and from thence to Dunfermling, and lastlie to Lochleuin, where he died, and was buried in saint Maris Ile in Lochleuin. The said William Schewes was consecrated archbishop of saint Andrews on Passon Sunday in Lent, within holie rood house, the king being present, and manie of the nobles of the realme. And there the said archbishop receiued the pall, as a signe of his archbishops dignitie, and so was confirmed primat and legat of the realme, notwithstanding the impediment made against Graham before by the bishops about the same.

This yere also Alexander duke of Albanye was committed to prison by the king his brother; within the castell of Edinburgh, through euill counsell; but he brake out and escaped to Dunbar, where he caused the castell to be furnished with all necessaries: and leauing his seruants within it, passed himselfe into France, and was there of the king honorable receiued, and louinglie intreated. In the beginning of Maie following, the king besieged that castell by his lieutenant the earle of Arundale, who lost at that siege three good knights, the lord of Lute, sir John Schaw of Sauch, & the lord of Cragiswallase, with the shot of a gun, & John Ramsie was slaine with a stone cast by hand. When they within saw they could not long indure, they left the castell and fled a waie by sea, and the earle of Arundale entered, and found it void of all things thereof any account was to be made.

Doctor Ireland being graduat in diuinitie at Paris, was sent from the French king vnto the king of Scots, to persuaue him to make war vpon England, to the end that king Edward should not aid the duke of Burgognie. And moreover, he had in charge to moue for the pardon of the duke of Albanye, and shortly after returned with answer. The erle of Mar called John Stewart the kings yonger brother, this yere in the moneth of December, was taken in the night within his owne house, and conueied vnto Cragmiller, where he was kept as prisoner by the kings commandement, and after was convicted of conspiracie for witchcraft which he should practise against the king: and hereupon in Cannogate beside Edinburgh, his veines were cut, and so he bled to death. There were manie and diuerse witches and sozerers, as well men as women convicted of that crime, and burnt for the same at Edinburgh. The king sent ambassadores into England to make sute to haue the ladie Cicill, daughter to king Edward, joined in mariage with his sonne James the prince, which was granted, and the mariage concluded to be solemnized, when the prince of Scotland should come to perfect age: as in the English historie it more plainlie appeareth. Doctor Ireland, with a knight, and another religious man, came againe to king James from the French king, to persuaue him to make warres against England: and at length, king James and his nobles condescended to breake the peace, wherewith Thomas Spenser bishop of Abirden (that was full tenderlie beloued of king Edward, and had bene ener a mediator for peace betwixt the kings of England, France, and Scotland, & the duke of Burgognie) when he heard that warre would follow, he died through griefe of mind mind and melancholie at Edinburgh, in the moneth of Aprill. The king sent two heralds unto king Edward, requesting him not to aid the duke of Burgonie, nor anie other against the king of France: for if he did, he must needs support the Frenchmen, by reason of the league betwixt France and Scotland: but king Edward would not admit those heralds to his presence, but kept them still without answer, till he had sent forth a naue of ships into the Forth before Leth, Kingorne, and Westertwen, and then were the heralds licenced to returne. The English fleet entering the Forth, took eight great ships which they found in that river, and landing at Blackness, burnt the towne, and a great barge that laie there at rode, and so returned.

The king assembled an armie from all parts of the realme, and amongst other, the lord of the Isles came with a great companie: and now the king being readie to enter into England, there came to him a messenger of king Edward, sent from a cardinall legat that was resident as then in England, commanding king James by authoritie apostolike, not to proceed any further in his purposed iourne, to the end that peace being obserued, all christian princes might bend their powers against the Turke & Infidels. This commandement did king James obeie, and so discharged his armie, notwithstanding that king Edward sent forth his naue againe into the Forth, to the Ile of Jura, Keith, but they did no hurt: for the countrie men kept them off. The Scottish boydeters invaded the English marches, destroyed townes, and led manie prisoners awaie with them into Scotland. The king of England caused Berwick to be assiged both by sea and land all the winter season, and overthrew a wall that was newlie made about it for defense thereof: but the Scots within it defended the towne so that time so stoutlie, that the enimies might not win it from them.

The duke of Albanie, after his wife was dead, whom he had married in France, perceiving himselfe not so well intreated as before, came ouer into England, where king Edward receiued him verie honorablie, promising (as some haue written) to make him king of Scotland: and thereupon assembled an armie of thirtie thousand men, with a great nauie by sea to invade Scotland, and appointed capteins and leaders of the armie by land, his owne brother the duke of Gloucester, the duke of Albanie, and others. The king of Scots hearing of their approach to invade his realme, raised a puissant armie to resist them, and came forward with the same vnto the towne of Loder, where being incamped, the principall nobles of his realme, as Archembald earle of Angus, George earle of Huntley, John earle of Lennox, James earle of Buchquhane, Andrew lord Greie, Robert lord Lile, and diuerse other being armed, entered the kings lodging, where they accused him of diuerse things done and practised by him contrary to his honor and the common-weale of his realme, and speciallie, because he used young counsell of lewd persons, vnto which and base of birth, such as Thomas Cochran, whome of a mason he had made earle of Mar, through whose deuise and counsell he had caused to be coined certaine monie of copper, not convenient to be current in anie realme, which the people refused, and so great dearth and hunger was raised through the countrie. Moreover, that he would not suffer the noble men to come nere his presence, nor to take their counsell in gouerning the realme, but gaue himselfe to voluptuous pleasure, setting naught by the queene his lawfull wife, & keeping a naughtie harlot called the Daisie in his place.

Also they laid to his charge, that he had put his brother the earle of Mar to death, and banished his other brother the duke of Albanie, and therefore they could not suffer him and the whole realme to be longer misled by such naughtie persons. And hereupon they took Thomas Cochran earle of Mar, William Roger, and James Hommill tailor, who with others being consided, were hanged ouer the bridge at Loder. Ornelie John Kaitheie a young man of eighteens yeres of age, for whome the king made great instance, was pardoned of life. This done, they returned to Edinburgh, and appointed the king himselfe to be kept in the castell by the earle of Atholl, and in the meane time, the second of August, they sent Andrew Steward elect bishop of Purrey, & John lord Darnelie to the English armie, lying then at Loder, to take truce for thre moneths: but the dukes of Gloucester and Albanie came forward vnto Kestralrig, where they incamped without anie resistance. The English nauie lying also in the Forth was readie to assist their fellowes by land.

Hereupon, certaine noble men of Scotland, as the archbishop of saint Andrewes, the bishop of Dunkeid, Colin earle of Argile, and Andrew Steward lord Auendale, great chancelor of Scotland, went to the English campe, & treating with the two dukes, agreed vpon certaine articles, whereby the duke of Albanie was receiued into his countrie againe in peaceable wise, and had giuen to him the castell of Dunbar with the earledoms of Mar and Mar. He was proclaimed also generall lieutenant to the king. And so the Englishmen returned homewards, and came vnto Berwick, where they hauing wone the towne as they passed that waies into Scotland, had left the lord Stanleie, and sir John Clorington, with foure thousand men, to keepe a siege before the castell, and now they enforced the same: but the lord of Halls then capteine within that castell, defended it verie manfullie, sending to the duke of Albanie and other, the lords of the counsell, for helpe to raise the siege. The duke in deed raised an armie, and came to Laner more, but when they within perceived that through dissention betwixt the king and the nobles of the realme, they were not like to be rescued, they yielded the castell into the Englishmens hands, the 24 of August, in that yere 1482, after it had remained now at this time in the Scottishmens hands the space of 21 yeres.

The king remaining as prisoner in Edinburgh castell, all things were ordered by the duke of Albanie, Andrew Steward lord of Auendale, chancelor, and others, till the said duke, the archbishop of saint Andrewes, the chancelor, the earle of Argile, and diuerse others, went to Strueling to visit the queene and prince, where the duke was perswaded by the queene, without knowledge thereof giuen to the other, to go vnto Edinburgh, and to restore the king vnto libertie. The duke accordingly to the queenes pleasure comming to Edinburgh, besieged the castell and won it, remoued the earle of Atholl, and set the king and all his seruants at libertie, for the which good turne, the king shewed great tokens of loue to his brother the duke, although it lasted not long. The earle of Argile, the bishop of saint Andrewes, the chancelor, and others, which remained at Strueling, when they heard those newes, fled into their owne countries: and shortly after, the bishop of saint Andrewes, at request of the king, resigned his bishopricke in fauor of maister Andrew Steward prior of Glencleiden, and was content in recompense thereof, with the bishopricke of Purrey. This yere there was great theft, reisse, and slaughter in diuerse parts of the realme, by occasion of the variance betwixt the king and his nobles.

certeine ambassadoys, which were Berouald or Bernard Stewart, lord of Aubignie, marshall of France, and Peter Gallart doctor of both lawes, to renew the old league betwene this James the third, and the king of France: for which cause the king of Scots and the nobles assembled at Edinburgh, where (with the French ambassadoys) seeking all the rols of all the ancient leagues, they reconfirmed the same, with the seales of both parts set thereunto, which done, the Frenchmen (with whom were sent into France divers Scots) returned home. Amongest the Scots, one Robertson was the chiefe, a man famous for the feates of battell, and having imploied his service on the parts of the French in the Italian warres, which being ended, the said chosen soldiers following the conduct of Berouald Stewart, went into England with Henrie earle of Richmond, after king, whose part they took against Richard at that time usurper upon the English, for which cause the earle of Richmond (when he was after king) did deserve love the Scots.

The seditions also, which a long time did burne in France, caused terrible wars to grow betwene the king of France and the duke of Burgognie. Whereunto, when the death of Charles (the last duke of Burgognie, slaine at Pantis by the duke of Orleans) did set end: Charles the eight of that name, king of France (assembling a great armie) did apply all his forces and devise to expell Alphonse out of the kingdom of Naples, who at that time succeeded happily unto him by reason that Alphonse was then easilie remoured: But after, when the Neapolitane people did revolt (from the French faction) to Ferdinand the son of Alphonse, there arose great flames of warre and sedition through Italie, each part striving to support the strength of his owne. The administration of which warre against Ferdinand, was chiefly performed by the Scots, as principall captains of that armie, or at the least equall with the best. Of which Scots the chiefe were Alexander duke of Albanie, son to James the second king of Scots; John also duke of Albanie sonne of this Alexander; George Montgomerie lord of Longes; Bernard Stewart (who was after made vicerey of Naples, which office he willed manie yeres did execute) Robert Stewart marshall of France, Nicholas Scot, and others, wherof manie (for their worthie exploits) were by the French honorable rewarded with great possessions. Who also (as manie of the Scots before had done) planting themselves in Calabria, became the authors of manie ancient families. For though by the evill custome of common speech, they retained the name of Scot (as taken of their countrey) yet by the ensignes, and tokens which they had and used, it may easilie be knowne of what families the Scots their ancestors did descend.

Wherefore it followeth by most certeine conjecture, that the ancient familie of the earles (to whom use of speech hath long obtained the surname of Scots) flourishing in Placentia, had their originall from the stocke of the Douglases, as the armes of them both do well witnesse: which kindred (besides manie other earles thereof) is at this day notable beautified by Christopher Scot, who (with singular pietie and learning) doth gouverne the church of Canallion. Again, there is another familie of Scots, commonly called the Scoties in Calabria, wherof Bernard Scotia, and Horace his brother (the one a senator of Mantua, and the other a prelat) are both famous, as well for their vertue, as nobilitie: also Francis Scotia, lord of Paine and Mondone, and other nobles of the marquesdome of Saluce, are descended from the Scots, with the large familie of the Schities (descended of James Orlando Scot, which we have heard confirmed by the armes of that familie) are well advanced about Cremona, Mantua, and Verona, as are also the Paparons in Rome (so called for their armes and ensignes) whose ancestors to be of the Scottish nobilitie, is witnessed by a worthie monument thereof in the church of saint Martie the great, in which the father and the son called Paparons, being there buried, are both adorned with the ensignes of knighthood out of Scotland.

The duke of Albanie, for that he understood there was passion given to him in drinke in the kings chamber, and therefore stood in feare of his life, fled from the court unto the castell of Dunbar, whereby ensued great discord. The king fearing the displeasure of his nobles, got him also into the castell of Edinburgh. The earles of Angus, Buchanane, and others, left the king, and assisted the duke of Albanie. And the king through counsell of certeine meane persons whom he had againe taken unto him, summoned the duke and other his assistants, to come to answer for such treason as he had to lay against them; a hostall prepared armie to besiege Dunbar, wherof the duke being advertised, fled into England, and afterwards being accompanied with the earle of Douglas, and a great number of Englishmen, invaded Scotland upon the west marches, where manie Englishmen were slaine and taken by the resistance of the lords Colpull, Johnston, and others, the duke was put to flight, and the earle Douglas taken and brought to the king, who because he was an aged man, and had bene long banished his countrey, was sent to the abbaye of Lindores, where he remained the rest of his daies, and at length, departing this life, was buried there.

The duke of Albanie for the losse of that armie, was blamed of the king of England, and thereupon taking a mistaking, secretly departed over into France by the helpe of John Liddell, sonne to sir James Liddell knight, who afterwards lost his life for the same. The duke was well entertained in France by the king there: and finally running at tilt with Holmes duke of Orleans, was hurt with the splint of a speare, and thereof died. He left behind him two sonnes, John duke of Albanie, that was after gouvernor and tutor to king James the first, and Alexander that was after bishop of Murray, and abbat of Scone. This yere the lord Hume, Torrellis, Miliant, and Drummond, were made lords of the parliament. In the yere 1484, the king sent the archbishop of saint Andrews unto Rome, for certeine privileges which he obtained. And the same yere, pope Innocent the eight of that name, sent the bishop of Amola to treat of peace, betwixt Richard king of England, and James king of Scotland. James king of Scots, having not long before made diverse incursions and rodes into England, and that to his profit, he sued thereupon for a truce, which came to passe even as king Richard wished, so that condescending to have a communication, commissioners were appointed for both parts to meet at Nottingham, the seventh day of September next ensuing.

For the king of Scots there appeared Colin earle of Argile, the lord Campbell, the lord chancelor of Scotland, William bishop of Aberdeen, Robert lord Lile, Laurence lord Miliant, John Drummond of Stobhall, Archembald Maitelaw archdeacon of Lathen, and secretarie to king James, Eion king of armes, and Duncan Dundas. For king Richard, there came Richard bishop of saint Asaph, John duke of Norfolk, Henrie earle of Northumberland, Thomas lord Stanleie, George Stanleie lord Strange, John Greie lord Holmes, Richard lord Fitzhugh, John Gunthorpe keeper of the kings privie seale, Thomas Barlow maister of the rols, sir Certaine noble families in Italie and Calabria spring from the Scots.

Thomas Brian chiefe iustice of the common pless, sir Richard Katcliffe knight, William Catesbie, & Richard Salkeld esquires. These counsellors in the later end of September, after sundrie meetings and communications had together, concluded (as followeth) a peace to be had betwixt both the realmes for the space of thre yeres, the same to begin at the rising of the sunne, on the 29 of September in the yere 1484, and to continue vnto the setting of the sunne on the 29 of September in the yere 1487.

During which terme, it was agreed, that not onely all hostilitie and warre should cease betwixt the two realmes, but that also all aid and abatement of enemies should be avoided, & by no colorable meanes or waie in anie case used. The towne and castell of Berwikke to remaine in the Englishmens hands, for the space of the said terme, with the same bounds as the Englishmen possessed it at that season, when it was deliuered to the Scottishmen by king Henrie the first. It was likewise condescended, that all other castels, holds, and fortresses, during the tearme of the said thre yeres, should abide in the hands of those that held them at that present, the castell of Dunbar onely excepted. This castell of Dunbar was deliuered vnto the Englishmen by the duke of Albanie, when he fled into France, and so remained in their hands at that time of concluding this truce.

Whereupon (by reason the Scottish commissioners had not authoritie to conclude anie full agreement for that castell, vnlesse the same might be ressoved vnto the king their maisters hands) it was accorded, that if the king of Scots, within the space of fortie daies next ensuing, did intimate his resolute refusall to be agreeable, that the said castell should remaine in the Englishmens hands aboue the space of six moneths, that then during that terme of six moneths, those that kept the castell for the Englishmen should remaine in quiet, and not be troubled nor molested by anie kind of meanes by the said king of Scots, or anie other by his procurement, so that they withyn the castell likewise absteyning from making anie issues or reisses vpon the Scottish people. And if after that the said terme of six moneths were once expired, it should chance that anie warre arose for defending or recouering the said castell, yet the truce should indure for all other rights and possessions, notwithstanding that it might be lawfull to do what lay in anie of their powers, either for winning or defending the foresaid castell, as though no truce had bene concluded.

It was further agreed, that no traitor of either realme should be receiued by the prince of either realme; and if anie traitor or rebell chanced to arrive in either realme, the prince thereof to deliuer him vpon demand made. Scots already abiding in England & Iwoyne to the king there, may remaine still, so their names be certified to the Scottish king within fortie daies. If anie warden of either realme should inuade the others subiects, he to whome such warden is subiect, shall within six daies proclaime him traitor, and certifie the other prince thereof within 12 daies. And in euerie safe conduct this clause should be contained; Provided alwaies that the obteiner of this safe conduct be no traitor. If anie of the subiects of either prince doe presume to aid, helpe, mainteine, or serue anie other prince against anie of the contractors of this truce, then it shall be lawfull for him, to whome he shewed himselfe enemy, to apprehend and attach the said subiect, going, comming, or tarieng within anie of his dominions.

Colleagues comprised in this truce (if they would assent thereto) on the English part were these: the king of Castile and Leon, the king of Arragon, the king of Portugale, the archduke of Austriach & Burgognie, and the duke of Britaine. On the Scottish part, Charles the French king, John king of Denmarke and Norwate, the duke of Gelderland, and the duke of Britaine. The lordship of Roine in the realme of Scotland, and the Island of Lundaie lieng in the riuier of Seuerne, in the realme of England, were not comprehended in this agreement. This concord, peace, and amitie thus concluded, was appointed to be published the first day of October, in the most notable cities and townes of both the realmes.

For the sure obseruation, keeping, & performance of this truce & league, there were appointed for conservatores on the Scottish side, David earle of Crawford and lord Lindseie, George earle of Huntley, lord Gordon and Badzenath, John lord Darneleie, John lord Benedie, Robert lord Lile, Patrike lord Halene, Laurence lord Diphant, William lord Bothwick, sir John Rolfe of Halkheid, sir Gilbert Johnston of Elphinston, sir John Lundie, sir John Ogilvie of Arlie, sir Robert Hamilton of Fingalton, sir William Balze of Lamington, sir John Benedie of Blarqhone, sir John Wemes, sir William Kochwen, Edward Stockton of Kirke patie, John Dundas, John Rolfe of Mountgrenan, esquires.

It was further agreed, that commissioners should meet at Loughmaben on the eighteenth day of November, as well for redresse of certeine offenses done on the west marches, as also for declaring and publishing the peace. On the English part, the lord Dacres, the lord Fitzhugh, sir Richard Katcliffe, sir Christopher Dorellie, sir Richard Salkeld, or thre of them. For the Scots, the lord Benedie, the lord Mountgomerie, the lord Lile, John Partwell, Edward of Annandale, Robert Creighton of Sanquhan, or thre of them. Also, there were assigned commissioners to meet at Koldenborne for the east marches, the first day of December; and at Haldan Stanke for the middle marches, on the fourth day of the same moneth. At which two places for Scotland, there were assigned to appeere the earle of Huntley, the earle of Angus, the earle of Argile chancelor of Scotland, the lord Annandale, the lord Setton, the lord Diphant, the lord Stubhall, with others.

For England, the earle of Northumberland, the lord Greystocke, the lord Scrope of Passan, sir William Gascoigne, sir Robert Constable, and other. The same commissioners had authoritie to assigne certeine persons, to view and declare the bounds and limits apperteyning to Berwikke, according to the true meaning of the league. For the battell ground it was accorded, that the same should remaine without sowing, earing, building, or inhabiting, as it had done before. Shortly after the concluding of this truce, king Richard intreated for a marriage to be had betwixt the prince of Rothsaie, eldest sonne to king James & ladie Anne de la Poole, daughter to John duke of Suffolke and to the ladie Anne his wife, that was sister to the said king Richard. For the concluding of this marriage, both the kings sent their ambassadors againe vnto Nottingham, where their treatie had such successe for that time, that the marriage was agreed vpon, and writings thereof drawn, ingrossed, and sealed, and affiances made and taken by proctors and deputies on both parts. The foresaid young ladie was immediately called pryncesse of Rothsaie, but by the short life of king Richard hir vncle the shortly after lost that name.

during the tearme of the whole truce in the Englishmens possessions, he wrote unto king Richard a loving letter, signifieng unto him, that he was not minded to seake the recouerie of the said castell by force of armes, but rather to leaue it in his hand, during the whole terme of the truce. Whereupon the king, he instantlie required him for the bond of that loue and familiaritie, which now by treatie and alliance was sprung by betwixt them, that he would redeliuer the said castell into his hands, according as reason might moue him thereto; considering the Englishmen had no right to it, being onelie deliuered to them by traitors of their native countrie, without anie reasonable cause, or commission lawfullie authorisid.

King Richard dailied in this matter with pleasant letters and faire words feeding forth king James, without minding to gratifie him in that sute, so that as long as king Richard liued, king James could neuer get it for anie thing he might doe. In the yeare 1486, Henrie earle of Richmond comming out of France with a power of men, of the which Bernard Steward a Scottishman was chiefe capteine, landed in Wales, and passing through the countrie into England, at length incountred king Richard, and slue him, so obtaining the crowne of that realme. And after he was somewhat quietlie established in the same, he came into the north parts, where he remained the most part of the next summer, and regarding nothing more than to haue the loue and friendship of his neighbors, & to be confederat with the kings and princes joining next unto him, he sent from Bewcastle one of his counsellors Richard For bishop of Excester, and sir Richard Edgcombe knight, ambassadors unto king James, to treat a contract, and renew the bond of peace and truce betwixt the said kings and their realmes.

These ambassadors were glablie receiued of king James, who declared unto them, that he bare great fauor and loue unto their maister, and would be glad to pleasure him in all he might: howbeit, that his subjects were not of so good a mind towards the English nation as he himselfe wished, and therefore he willed them to be contented with a truce for seven yeares, fith further he could not doe, for doubt to offend his nobilitie and subjects. But he promised secretly, that when those seven yeares were expired, he would renew the same for the tearme of other seven yeares, and so from seven yeares to seven yeares so long as he liued. This he did, because he perceived that his people had him in such hatred, that they would not consent to anie bond that he should make. The ambassadors perceiuing his good meaning toward king Henrie, confirmed the truce for those seven yeares, and so returned home to king Henrie, who was glad of that they had done.

In the meane time died the quene, a woman of singular beautie and godnesse, who was supposed greatlie to mitigat the vnbridled force of hir husband. At what time also in France died Alexander the kings brother, leauing behind him two sonnes, which were Alexander bozne of his first wife (daughter to the earle of Dikeneie) and John (bozne of his second wife) being after made gouernor of Scotland. Immediatlie after that this truce was thus concluded betwixt the two realmes, king James caused the three estates to assemble in parliament at Edinburgh the first of October in the yeare 1487, in the which order was taken, that iustice oress should be holden through all the parts of the realme, & that no pardons should be granted for anie great crime that should be committed for the space of seven yeares to come, so that the king began to vse sharpe execution of iustice in all parts, which was right dis-

At the same time was an ambassador sent to the king of Romans, for the calling in of a letter of marque, which had bene granted against Scottish merchants, at the sute and instance of certeine Hollanders and Burgognions, and was shortly after hereupon reuoked. After the parlement was ended, the king remoued unto Striueling, leauing his wife the quene, and hir sonne the prince at Edinburgh castell, whilist he keeping persons about him of meane calling, gaue himselfe to take his pleasure with women, & to gather by gold and siluer, greatlie to the offense of his subjects. Yet in the meane time, now after the death of king Richard, whether it was by treason or appointment, the castell of Dunbar was deliuered to the hands of king James, and that to his great ioy and high contentation; for he that ruled his kingdome more with rigor than with anie tractable meane of fauorable iustice, stood euer in feare of some troublesome tumult that might be raised by his owne people, if occasion were minis-tered either through hope of forren aid or otherwise.

So long therefore as the castell was in the Englishmens hands, he doubted least through practise, some conspiracie should be contriued betwixt his owne subjects and the English nation, greatlie to the annoiance of his estate, & thereupon he was the more desirous to reduce the same castell into his possession. But the onelie meane to haue assured himselfe from the hands of such as sought his life, had bene to haue changed his wilfull maner of gouernment, & to haue leaned unto such counsell as would haue aduised him for the wealth of his whole realme, and not upon desire to please, haue maintained his vndiscreet opinions, to the wronging astwell of his commons as of the nobles and peeres of his realme; for the nobilitie of Scotland, namelie the earles of Angus, Argile, and Lenox, the lords Halls, Hume, Drummond, Greie, and others, perceiuing themselves oppressed by such as from base birth had risen (without worthie deserving) to the degree of counsellors, and therewith aduanced to so high authoritie, as all things were ordered at their appointment, conspired together, & determined by force of armes to see a reformation in such a disordered maner of gouernement.

But yet because it should not be thought that they minded the destruction of their countrie, but rather the aduancement thereof, they made the lord James duke of Rothsaie sonne to the king (a child bozne to godnesse and vertue) the chiefe capteine in this their enterprize, and that in maner against his will; hereby openlie protesting, that they minded and purposed the suppressing and confusion of an euill king, and not the subuersion of their native countrie. By which their craftie imagined inuention, they thought to remoue all suspicion of their purposed vntruth and shamefull disloyaltie. They had sent to the earle of Dowglaste, who remained prisoner (as ye haue heard) in the abbeie of Lundoris, and required him to assist them in their begun enterprize, promising that they would restore him againe to his lands and former dignitie, and honor him as principall of their faction. But that noble, wise, and ancient earle, being already schooled with troubles, and hauing learned by experience (to his great griefe) what such matter meant, refused to breake his ward, or to assist them in anie wise, dissuading them from their enterprize, because it seemed to him neither goodlie nor honozable, liethens both himselfe and his friends had tasted for the like, great hinderance, which might be an example to him and others to beware in time to come.

and conspiracie against him, was sore disquieted in his mind, and to meet their mischievous attempts, gathered an armie. Yet before the using of anie force, he sent messengers to his sonne, and to the nobles with him, to trie if he might come to some agreement with them. He sent also letters to the king of England, & to the French king, requiring them to take some paines in the matter, to procure an atonement betwixt him and his nobles. And besides this, he wrote to pope Innocent about the same purpose, praiering him to intermeddle his authoritie by sending some legate into Scotland, to appease the troubles thereof. But the Scottish nobilitie, and such of the people as were vp in armes against him, were so desperatlie set, and wholie bent on reuenge, that no wholesome counsell nor medicinable aduise might appease their furious rage, so that for answer to his messengers, they sent him word, that if he would resigne the title of his crowne and realme, & depose himselfe of his whole regall dignitie, then they would come to some communication with him or else not. The like answer was giuen to the ambassadores of England and France, that were sent vnto them from the kings of both those realmes, which sore lamented the fortune of their friend and alie the Scottish king.

But Adrian the bishop of Romes legat came too late, as who should say, a day after the faire: for when their grounded malice and spittell hatred conceived against him might not be qualified by anie manner of means, but that they were now comming forward with all their puissance to Striueling, where he then remained, he would not staie till the eyles of Huntlie, Erroll, Atholl, Crawford, Rothus, Sutherland, Cathnesse, & Marshall; the barons, Forbes, Ogilvie, Grant, Fraser, and others, were arrived with their powers, amounting to the number of forty thousand men, with the which they were comming forth of the north parts to his aid: but rashlie and without god aduise he issued out of the towne, accompanied with the earles of Glencarne & Montros, the lords Graham, Ruthuen, Marwell, and certaine others, and forthwith ioined battell with his aduersaries at Banockesborne, within two miles of Striueling.

Now when nothing might quiet them, at length they met thus in a pitched field, where after great slaughter & murder made of an huge multitude of people, the king being put to the worse, fled into a mill, whither being fiercelie followed and found therein, he was cruellie slaine, and irreuerentlie left stark naked. A notable mirrour to all princes, that calling to remembrance such a miserable and most dolorous sight, they may take heed by what manner of persons they suffer themselves to be led and abused. For if this prince king James the third had not followed vpon a willfull pretense, and obstinat mind, the counsell and aduise of vantage, and such as (being advanced from base degree vnto high authoritie) studied more to keepe themselves in fauor, than to giue true aduertisements, and faithfull aduise vnto their prince, he might haue reigned longer by manie daies & yeres, in great and high felicitie. [In which conflict was on the kings part slaine (as saith Buchanan) Alexander Coningham earle of Glencarne.] He was thus slaine nere Striueling, on the seventh day of June, the yere after the incarnation 1488, being also the 29 of his reigne.

Now then, after that the barons of Scotland had thus slaine their soueraigne lord and liege king James, the third of that name: his eldest son James the fourth was crowned king of Scotland, and began his reigne the 24 of June, in the yere 1488, being not past sixteen yeres of age, who notwithstanding that he had bene in the field with the nobles of the realme against his father, that contrarie to his mind was slaine; yet neuertheless afterwards, he became a right noble prince, & seemed to take great repentance for that his offense, and in token therof, he wore continuallie an iron chaine about his middle all the daies of his life. He was treatlie giuen to deuotion and praier, visiting religious houses, and bestowing on them sundrie gifts. He gouerned his realme in great rest, peace, iustice, and quietnes, riding him selfe in proper person diuerse daies and nights, to suppress and take thieues, robbers, and oppressors of his subiects in all parts of his realme, till he had brought the countrie to great quietnesse. He was learned and liberrall, and indued with manie other good vertues and qualities.

Anon after his coronation, the earle of Lennor, and the lord Lile, with diuers other their assistants, notwithstanding that they had bene with him at the slaughter of his father, seeing that things went not as they wished, raised an armie, and caused the dead kings bloudie shirt to be borne afore them for a banner: and comming forwards toward Striueling against the young king, were ouerthrowne at Tolsmoss, where the Lennor men, and sundrie other of the barons side were slaine, as the lord of Kilstrucht, and other taken and hanged for their offences. The king called a parlement at Edinburgh, which was holden the first of October, where he being moued by clemencie, granted a generall pardon to all those that came in field at Striueling with his father against him, and appointed euerie one to haue speciall pardons therevpon vnder his seales. He likewise dispensed with the heires of them that were slaine with his father there in field, appointing them their particular dispensations vnder his seales, after the same manner. Further it was ordeined, that all iustices, shiriffes, stewards, bailiffes, lieutenants, and other which had offices in heritage, and had bene with his father at the field, should be suspended from the same offices for the tearme of thre yeres: and those which had offices for life, or for terme of yeres, should be vtterlie excluded from the same.

Moreouer, he took order that all such goods as had bene taken from landed men and burgeses, should be restored to them againe, except that which was taken from such landed men and burgeses as were in the field against him; for that was deemed a lawfull preie. It was also iudged that the death of his father came vpon him through his owne default, and that king James the fourth then reigning, and all his adherents and partakers in that field, were innocent and guiltlesse of all slaughter made there at that time, and clearlie acquit of all pursute and occasion thereof: the thre estates granting to giue their seales to testifie the same, with the kings great seale of the realme, to be shewed vnto the pope, the kings of France, Spaine, Denmarke, and other princes their confederats. And for the ceasing of theft, reisse, & such other great enormities, the king was appointed to ride in person once euerie yere through all parts of the realme. And certaine noble men were ordeined to exercise iustice in euery shire next adioining to the places where they had their chiefe residence: and herevnto they gaue their othes to be diligent in the administration of iustice. These ordinances were right well obserued all the daies of James the fourth his life time, so that the realme was reduced to great tranquillitie, and gouerned in good peace and iustice. Furthermore, all gifts made by his father in prejudice of the crowne, were reuoked, from the second day of Februarie immediatlie preceeding his death, to the day in which he was slaine.

* About this time was a monster borne of a strange forme, hauing from the nauill downeward the perfect parts of one man, not different from the right proportion of a man: but from the nauill vppward, it was double bodied, hauing all perfect parts answering euerie of those bodies, sundered to all actions and shew. This monster the king commanded to be diligentlie nourished and instructed, but chiefelie in musike (wherein it profited verie much.) Further also learning diuers sorts of languages, whose seuerall wits and natures manifestlie appeared by diuers dispositions of their minds. For sometime they would fall out one with another, and when anie thing displeased them, they would most bitterly contend the one with the other: contrarie, when anie thing happened to their liking or desire, they would consult and agree together as friends. In which this was worthe remembrance, that if the legges or loines had bene hurt below, they both together felt the paine; but if they were pinched or grieued in any part aboue feuered from the other, then that bodie onelie felt the same which had that hurt done vnto it. Which different sensc did more plainelie appeare in the death of the one of them: for when the one bodie died manie daies before the other, that which liued, did after by little and little consume, by the putrifaction of the other bodie then dead; which monster liued 28 yeeres, and in the time of John the gouernor: of which thing we doubt not to write (more boldlie) sith there are men yet liuing of honest fame which saw these things.)

This king in the beginning of his reigne, to make his estate the surer, and more faithfull to reconcile the harts of such as had maintained factions against him, determined to marie the daughters of his aunt by two husbands, to two of those noble men: for which cause he married Greina Wold to Alexander Forbois, and Margaret Hammliton to Patrick Stewart, by which in time there followed a most singular peace in the kingdome. Also an esquier, and an herald were sent into France, Spaine, and other places, to learne where the king might be a suter for some great ladie to soine with him in marriage. Moreover beside these, there were sent honorable ambassadois into France, Spaine, and Denmarke, to renew the old amities & leagues betwixt those realmes and Scotland, as had bene vsed in the daies of this kings progenitors. His two brethren, the duke of Rothesie, and the earle of Mar, he caused to be brought vp in good nourture and vertuous exercise, appointing to them such livings for maintenance of their estates, as his father had assigned them.

For his counsell he chose a certefine number of the prelates, noble men, and barons of his realme, such as were thought most meet, taking this order, that six of them at the least should continually remaine about him, by whose aduise he should do all things that touched the affaires of the realme: and in case any thing was done without their aduise, the same should be indged void, & not to be obeyed, & this was inuolablie kept all his daies. When the esquier and herald were returned againe into Scotland, which had bene to visit strange countries, and made report of that they had seene, there was a parlement holden, in which it was ordeined, that the bishop of Glasgou, the earle Bothwell, and others, should go as ambassadois to sue for the kings marriage in place where it should be most expedient, and most to the kings liking. Great variance rose betwixt the archbishop of saint Andrieus, and the bishop of Glasgou, touching the preheminance of their iurisdiction, which drew the noble men into factions, till the king commanded the same to cease, and that they should trie it by laie before competent iudges.

* James Ogilvie knight of Aire, was sent ambassadois to the king of Denmarke, to whome the king gaue in charge, that he should labor to renew the old league that was betwene the Danes and the Scots, which he wisely executed and obtained, with certefine priuileges for the benefit of the merchants. By means whereof at his returne, he purchased such fauour of the king, as that he was aduanced to the title of a lord, in which the name of the Ogilvies was first increased with anie honorable title.) The king about the same time toke order for increase of some number of ships to be had in his realme, and that euerie haven to wone should build some, as well for fishing, as to transport merchandize from place to place.

The lords and barons, and such other as would, were commanded to helpe the merchants toward the building of such ships: and for good crample, the king caused to make certefine ships at his owne charges, which might vse the trade of fishing. Moreover, the king considering the ignorance that was amongst the landed men of his realme, when they should passe vpon inquests, he ordeined that euerie landed man should put his eldest sonne to schole, that he might learne perfectlie the lawes of the realme, and that vpon great forfeiture. Thus in the beginning of his reigne, diuers good lawes and constitutions were made, for the advancement of the common-wealth, which he caused to be duly obserued and kept during his time. The pope sent a protonotarie called Forman into Scotland, with a rose and a scepter of gold, to be presented vnto the king, desiring him to perseuere in goodnesse, honor, and vertue, as he had begun. The most part of this yeere the king spent in riding abroad through all parts of his realme to see iustice ministred, speciallie in the norther parts, where the people are commonlie furthest out of order.

There was shortly after some appearance of warres betwixt England and France, wherevpon king Charles sent vnto king James, requiring him of assistance, if it came to passe that the English men did invade France: and further declared, that he had one with him called Richard duke of Yorke, second sonne to king Edward the fourth, who had bene preserued now manie yeeres secretlie by his aunt Margaret duchess of Burgognie, and therefore was iust inheritor to the realme of England, whom he would send into Scotland, praieing the king to assist him to recouer his rightfull heritage, the said realme of England. And shortly after herevpon, the said seined duke (whose right name was Perkin Warbecke, as in the English historie it appeareth) arrived in Scotland well and honorablie accompanied, to trie what purchase he might make there for succors to attaine his pretended right to the crowne of England.

* After whose arrivall he was brought to the presence of king James, before whom he did lamentable bewaile (as he well could) the fall of the house of Yorke, and his owne calamities: most humble and vehementlie beseeching him, to ransom the kinglie blood from that contumelie. For answer wherevnto at that present time, the king bid him be of good heart, for he would so worke, that he should find his sute not defrauded: of all due effect, in obtaining succor in his distresse. Few daies after, the king assembling together his counsell, commanded this (counterfeit) duke of Yorke to be brought vnto him, who now (more than before) did in this assemble bitterlie complaine of his misfortune, shewing, that being borne to great hope of a kingdome (as the sonne of the noblest king of that age) he was left void bold of all helpe by the death of his father, & had like to haue fallen into the tyrannie of his vnckle Richard duke of Gloucester, before he could vnderstand what calamitie or misfortune might signifie.

But aided by diuine assistance, he (when his elder brother was murdered by his vnckle) was preserved by the helpe of his fathers friends, and conueied away from the bloudie hands of the usurping king Richard, who (not able in that kingdome, whose heire by right he was) to lead a bare and begged life, did so liue in forrein countries, as he counted the condition of his brother (taken from those miseries by sudden death) to be happie in respect of his owne troubles and extremitie: for he was reserued aliuie to the scoene of fortune, not daring at the first to beuaile his calamitie amongst strangers, whereby he might moue their pitie towards him: yea (and after) when by little and little he came to open what person hee was, how noblie borne, whose heire, and to whome alied, he was (to increase all his former miseries) more grieuouslie assaulted by the malice of fortune than before. For then he could not almost liue in safetie in any place, because of the subtiltie of his enemies, who would haue bought his life (of those with whom he remained) priuillie solliciting them to discover his secrets, and (vnder the colour of feined amitie) to corrupt his true friends, to search out and discover his hidden friends, and to defame him amongst the common people.

Wherewithall not yet satisfied, they reuile (saith he) the ladie Margaret his aunt, and imprison the nobles of England that seemed to fauor his cause; notwithstanding all which (he vsing the truth of his owne conscience against the slanders of hir and his enemies, and moued with pitie for the distresse of his kinsman) did with his abilitie relieue his necessitie. But at length, when he saw no sure defense in a woman and widow (whose authoritie could not stretch to the command of his people in that liberall sort as he would) he was driuen to seeke the aid of other princes, and to request them to looke into the misfortunes that might light vpon such great estates, and that they would not suffer kinglie blood (oppressed by tyrants) to lament in such extremitie. For yet he was not so base minded (although hee were in manie great miseries) that he would not hope at one time or other to be restored to his kingdome, by the helpe of such friends as he had in Ireland and England: adding thereto the helpe which he should haue out of France, whereof he had already made some triall by the singular beneuolence of the same king, hauing liberallie imparted manie benefites vnto him.

Wherewith, not supposing this to allure the kings mind to his fauor, he began by flatterie to extoll him, not douting but he (whose fauor had bene liberallie shewed to the distressed) would now diminish the same to him; but that he hoped that he would (for his singular humanitie to all banished persons, for pitie towards a miserable creature, for loue towards his kinsman, for necessities cause towards his friend, and for the necessitie of league that ought to be among princes) succor and relieue him with men and monie, thereby to helpe him to the recouerie of his kingdome. Wherfore againe he importunately requirerth the king of aid in this extremitie, since the same was honorable to himselfe, acceptable to God, beneficiall for his realme, and a singular fame among other princes in joining with them determined to restore him. Which if he might obtaine (and that the rather by his furtherance) he did liberallie promise alwayes to stand a most firme friend to the Scots, for whose cause he would spend his crowne and life.)

such subtill wise, that king James either giuing, or seeming to giue credit to his words, after aduise and deliberation had and taken with his counsell, receiued him in honorable wise, naming and reputing him duke of Borke, and therefore promised him to aid him in all that he might. And shortly after, hee married him to his neere kinswoman the ladie Katharine, daughter to the earle of Huntley, and moreouer raised a great armie, spectallie of the borderers, and with the same hauing this pretended duke in companie with him, inuaded England, burnt towns spoiled houses, and tooke great booties and rich preies both of goods and prisoners, & allured with the sweetnesse of such spoile and gaine, wasted all the countrie of Northumberland, and had gone further, but that he could perceiue no aid comming in vnto this new found duke, contrarie to such golden promises as he had made, that as soone as they were entered into England, there would flocke vnto him both of the nobilitie and commons, and that in great numbers.

King James perceiuing no such matter, thought it better to returne with assured gaine, than to tarie this new sprung dukes doubtful and vn certaine victorie. And so hauing his people laden and pestered with spoile and prisoners, he drew backe into Scotland. The king of England aduertised hereof, made preparation for the raising of an armie, meaning to send the same against the Scots: but the rebellion of the Cornishmen, which chanced the same time about a tarenteuted then of the people, constrained him to imploie that armie to repress the enterprize of those rebels. Yet neuertheless he sent the earle of Surreie to the borders, that with the power of the countrie adioining, he might defend the same from the inuasions of the Scots, if they attempted to breake in: and so the earle late on the borders all that yere.

King James then perceiuing that no maine armie came against him, inuaded easies the borders of England, and laid siege to the castell of Roxham, sending his light horsemen abroad into Northumberland, and the bishopricke of Durham, where they burned and spoiled all about in the countrie: but hearing that the earle of Surreie had raised an armie, and was comming towards them, they returned to the host lieng before Roxham, where king James perceiuing he could not win the castell, notwithstanding he had done great hurt and damage thereto, he raised his siege, retired into his countrie, and left great companies on the borders for defense thereof. And so before the comming of the English armie, king James was returned. The earle of Surreie yet (as the English writers affirme) followed into Scotland, and tooke diuerse castles and towers, remaining within the countrie the space of six or seven daies, and then came backe without battell or any notable skirmish offered.

About the same time was one Peter Hialas sent ambassador from Ferdinando king of Spaine, to treat as a mediator for the concluding of peace betwixt the kings of England and Scotland, which Hialas trauelled so earnestlie in the matter, that at length it was agreed, that certaine commissioners of both the realmes should meet at Apelrosse, where for the king of England, doctor For, then bishop of Durham, with this Hialas, and other graue personages, met the Scottish commissioners. After long conference and much talke had, for the conclusion of a generall peace, finally nothing but a truce might be accorded for certaine yeres, though Hialas did what he possiblie might to haue agreed them for all manner of matters, quarrels, demands, and causes, thatauer the same had bene, that a perpetuall peace might haue bene concluded, because he was thither sent

The king of England required to haue the counterfeitt duke of Yorke (otherwise named Perkin Warbecke) deliuered to him: but king James (cōfessing his honoꝝ more than anie earthlie thing) would in no wise seeme to betraie him that fled to him for succour, and with whome he had copled one of his owne kinswomen in marriage: but he was contented to couenant, that the same Perkin should be constrained to depart out of Scotland, and not to be further aided by him, or by anie other through his meanes or procurement. The king of Scots to keepe promise made in the said treatie of peace, and knowing himselfe to be abused by the said Richard, whom he had reputed to be verelie duke of Yorke (although he was not so) called him before his presence, and declared to him the great fauour and good will which he had borne towards him, putting him in remembrance that for his sake he had taken warre in hand against England, and invaded the countrie in hope of assistance by his friends within the land, where not one resorted to him.

And albeit he had married his nere kinswoman, yet might he not keepe longer warre with England for his sake onelie; except he might be sure of some aid through his meanes, whereof he could see no appearance. He desired him therefore to withdraue forth of his realme, either into Flanders to his fathers sister the ladie Margaret; or into some other place where it pleased him to abide, and expect some better time more conuenient for his purpose. The said Richard gaue the king thanks, and obied his pleasure, departing shortly after out of Scotland, and sailed into Ireland, from thence to transport into Flanders. But finally making an attempt into England, he was taken prisoner in the abbeye of Beaulien, together with his wife, whose beautie was such, as king Henrie thought hir a more meet preie for an emperoz, than for souldiours, and therefore vsed hir verie honozable, appointing hir to remaine in the court with the quene his wife, where she continued so long as the said king liued.

This yere, the peace being well kept betwixt England and Scotland, the same was nere at point to haue bene broken; by reason that the Englishmen which laie in garrison within the castell of Posham, did make a strate with certeine Scottishmen that came riding nere to the castell, as it had bene to haue viewed it. But although they ment no euill, yet diuerse of the Scottishmen were slaine, and manie wounded and sore hurt; so that king James hauing information thereof, was sore displeased therewith, thinking and saieing, that there was no more incertainte thing, than to haue peace with England. And hereupon he sent his herald Merchmount with sharpe and vehement letters vnto the king of England, making great complaint for this iniurie and wrong done to his subiects, by those within the castell of Posham. But receiuing most reasonable letters for excuse of that which was done, as well from the king of England himselfe, as from the bishop of Durham owner of the castell, he was indifferentlie well pleased & satisfied, so that he required to haue the bishop to come into Scotland upon safe conduct to conuene with him, as well for the full quieting of this matter, as for other things which he had to talke with him of.

The bishop by licence of the king his maister, accomplished the Scottish kings request; so that coming into Scotland, he was receiued by him verie honozable at Edinbrough, where (after certeine talke had betwixt them for the appeasing of this last displeasure) the king brake with the bishop for the hauiing of the ladie Margaret, eldest daughter to Henrie the seuenth, as then king of England, to be giuen him in marriage: and further declared that he was minded to send his orators vnto hir father the said king Henrie, about the same matter. And forsomuch as he knew that the bishop was one that might do much with king Henrie, who highlie fauoured him for his singular wisdom and learning, he desired him to be a meane to further his sute, which if it were obtained, he trusted it should highlie rebound to the honoꝝ & wealth of both the realmes. The bishop considering hereina as much as the king was able to tell him, did not onelie promise to do all that in him lay, but also encouraged him to send his orators with all speed, trusting that they should receiue a verie towardlie answer.

King James following the bishops aduise, anon after his returne into England, sent certeine persons ambassadoꝝ vnto king Henrie, to moue him to the effect aboue mentioned. These ambassadoꝝ were highlie welcomed, and verie well heard, so that to be brieue, their request seemed so agreeable to king Henries mind, that the marriage was shortly thereupon concluded (but not consummate betwixt the foresaid James king of Scotland, and the said ladie Margaret daughter to king Henrie) in the tenthenth yere of the said king Henries reigne. At the same time, when this marriage was so agreed vpon, a peace was also concluded betwixt the kings of England and Scotland, for the terme of their two liues. And to auoid that none of either of the said kings subiects that had offended the lawes, should be receiued into anie of their dominions; it was accorded, that no Englishman should come within Scotland, without his princes letters supplicatorie vnto the king of Scots, nor anie Scottishman to come within England, without the like letters from his prince, desiring safe conduct and passeport.

In the yere next insuing, Robert Blakater the bishop of Glasgowe, Adam Hepborne the earle Bothwell, and other noble men of Scotland, were sent in ambassage from king James vnto the king of England; for the perfecting of the foresaid marriage betwixt king James, and the ladie Margaret, eldest daughter to king Henrie, which earle by letters of procuracie and mandat, in the name of his maister king James, assied and handfasted the foresaid ladie Margaret in all solemne wise, according to the manner: which assurance and contract thus made, was published at Pauls crosse in London, on the day of the conuersion of saint Paule, in reioicing whereof Te Deum was song, and fiers made, with great feasting & banquetting throughout that citie. This done, the ambassadoꝝ returned into Scotland, and then afterwards was great preparation made in England for the conueieng of the said ladie into Scotland, and likewise great purueiance there for the receiuing of hir.

On the sixteenth of June, king Henrie toke his iournie from Richmond, with his daughter the said ladie Margaret, and came to Colchester, where his mother the countesse of Richmond then laie. And after he had remained there certeine daies in pastime and great solace, he toke leaue of his daughter, giuing hir his blessing with a fatherlie exhortation, and committed the conueiance of hir into Scotland vnto the earle of Surreie, and others. The earle of Northumberland, as then warden of the marches, was appointed to deliuer hir vpon the borders vnto the king of Scotland. And so this faire ladie was conueied with a great companie of lords, ladies, knights, esquires, and gentlemen, vntill she came to the towne of Berwik, and from thence vnto Lambert church in Hamer more within Scotland, where she was receiued by the king and all the nobles of that prince of Scotland departed this life at Striueling, and the bishop of Galloway also, who was appointed to be his gouernour.

* About this time, the k. (to tell you here, as saith Lelcus, a matter that to this day is remembred amongest the Romane people with great laughter) created a certeine Italian (with whose wit and pleasant speach he was delighted) abbat of Tungland. This man (being a noble framer of deceit, & boaster of his wit) did on a time persuade the king, that he was so conuersant in all hidden knowledge of naturall things, and in the secret science of Alchymie, that he could turne all other mettals into pure gold, if anie would beare the charge thereof. But after much time spent thereabout (with long looking of the king, and the nobilitie, to see the effect hereof) there was nothing done, but that their purses were emptied, and the baine man was defamed by the breach of his promise. At length when he was fallen into the hatred and offense of all men, he did (partlie to gather againe an opinion & report of his baine glozie, and partlie to recouer the kings sauour) giue out a rumour, that he would (by flying) be in France before the ambassadors (which were sent thither, and had lused from thore to take their iournie) should come thither. For the performance whereof, he appointed a day for them to meet at Striueling, from whence he would take his flight, and begin his iournie. At what time, and to what place, manie resorted together, desirous to see this new bird; amongest whome (for recreations cause) came the king also.

What need manie words. This man fastening (which he had caused to be made of the fethers of diuerse foules) vnto both his sides, lifted by himselfe from the castell of Striueling, into the aire to take his iournie: but this deceiver suddenlie fell headlong to the ground, not able to be holpen by the force of his wings: wherewith the people (uncertaine whether they should rebuke the follie of the man, or pittie his misfortune) flocked about him, demanding this winged abbat how he did: to whome he answered, that he had broken the bone of his thigh, and was out of hope to flie anie more hereafter. To conclude, they all were like to die with laughing, to see him, which before would flie like Icarus, did now lie like Simon Magus, with all his bodie almost broken in peeces. At length when euerie one had laughed their fill, this wretched abbat, to salve all the matter, referred the default of his flying wholie to his wings, because they were not made of eagles fethers and such like, but onelie of pullens fethers, not meet or accustomed to cut the aire with flight; and which by a certeine inward vertue (working according to the nature of those foules) did draw the fethers downe toward the donghill (wher vpon those birds lue) as the adamant draweth iron.]

The 9 of Maie in the yeare after, the lord D'obinie, and the president of Wholous, came from Letwes the French king as ambassadors to declare vnto king James, that he ment to match his eldest daughter in marriage with Francis de Wallois of Wren, and duke of Angoulesme; notwithstanding that Charles king of Castile that was after emperor, made sute for hir. Because therfore he ment not to conclude anie thing in such a weightie matter without consent of his confederats, of which he esteemed king James as chiefe, he required him of his aduise and counsell therein; who after aduise taken, made answer, that albeit the king of France had sufficient counsell about him, yet sith he had desired his aduise, he would friendlie giue the same: which was that he should rather marie his daughter within his owne realme, vnto such as should succeed him, than to bestow hir vpon anie foren prince, with other wise some claime might be made in time comming vnto the crowne by such as should match with hir. And so with this answer, the president of Wholous departed, reporting the saue at his comming home vnto the French king, who thereupon followed his owne determination therein, confirmed and allowed thus by his confederat the king of Scotland.

The lord D'obinie took a sicknesse and died thereof at Corrospin, in the moneth of Iune, and caused his heart to be sent vnto saint Minians in Galloway; because he had vowed a pilgrimage thither whilst he remained the French kings lieutenant in Naples, where he had achieved manie high enterprises against his enemies. His name was Bernard Steward, lieutenant of those men of warre which Charles the eight of that name king of France did send with Henrie earle of Richmond into England, when the same earle came against king Richard, whom he banquished, and thereby got the crowne. And so after manie noble victories and valiant acts achieved, this lord D'obinie ended his life in his owne countrie of Scotland, where he was borne. This yeare also in Maie and Iune, there were kept great iusts and tourneys in Edinburgh, by one calling himselfe the wild knight, who counterfeited the round table.

There were diuerse ambassadors sent forth this yeare also, as the archdeacon of saint Andrews, and sir Anthonie Darcie into France, and the bishop of Murray into England. The fifteenth of Iulie, the queene was deliuered of a daughter, which shortly after she had receiued baptisme, deceased, and the queene in that childbed was againe in great perill of death. The bishop of Glasco died this yeare in his iournie to Jerusalem, the nine and twentieth of Iulie; James Beton succeeded him in that see. The thirtieth of Iulie, there was a great fraie betwixt the lord Sparwell, and the lord Creighton of Sanchar, where the lord Creighton was chased with his companie from Dunfreis, & the lord of Daliell and the young lord of Crauthlaie with diuerse other were slaine. The nineteenth of September was a great earthquake in manie places both of England and Scotland, namelie, the same was perceiued in churches.

The king of England sent a gentleman with horses trimlie trapped with bards of fæle to be presented to king James, who thankfullie receiued them, and right honozable rewarded the messenger. The archdeacon of saint Andrews returned forth of France in a great ship called the treasure, which ship was cast away on the coast of England, and the archdeacon, and foure hundred persons that were in hir, were brought to the king of England: but the archdeacon in Nouember following returned home and came to Edinburgh. Adam earle of Bothwell and lord Hales departed this life at Edinburgh the seventeenth day of October, and earle Patrike succeeded him. Henrie the seventh king of England, passed out of this world the two and twentieth of April, in the yeare 1509, and his sonne Henrie the eight succeeded him, after whose coronation king James sent an honozable ambassage of certeine lords and a bishop to congratulat him at his first entrie into the rule of his kingdome, as to the maner in such cases apperteineth.

* At this time, John and Andrew Barton (obteining letters of marque from the king against the Portingals) prieng on the borders of Portingale did take manie of their ships (landed with rich merchandise) which they brought into Scotland. Which kind of prizes being often made by the Bartons vnto the Portingals, gaue them cause gréuoulle to complaine to their king, of the wicked piracie of the Scots.

Scots: but neither the king of Portugal nor his people wish their force, credit or any other advantage to be taken by the Scots, but that he should be contented with the Portuguese ships, if he happened againe with any of them. Considering which, because it shall not seeme to be a manifest wrong by the Scots to the other, and not rather a well coming given by the Portuguese, we have here written the letters of our king James the first, as they be found amongst the records belonging to James the first king of Portugal for this matter. In which it shall manifestly appear, whether the Scots have not caused in the Portuguese to do.

James the first, king of Scotland, to the most excellent prince of Portugal.

Whereas your friend, and dear countryman, certain vessels with a Scottish ship laden with merchandise, returning from the port of Seville in Flanders, was invaded by two armed ships, governed by Portuguese, whereof the one was called John Cabot, and the other John Port. Which ship seized certain of our merchants home, many wounded, many taken prisoners, and the rest cast into aether-burne to be let on land at the next ship, was by them carried into Portugal: all which was done to the sight of the coast of the Lusitan ships, which at the same time did assist out of that haven to pass into Portugal. The full counsel whereof, Charles the duke of Burgundy, ambassador of Flanders, understanding, and moved not so much for the singular wrong done to the Scots, as by the breach of the privilege, a right of his burghs and signified the same wrong, and found by order of judgement to the king of Portugal, admonishing him, that in like he was not for such wicked deeds, and for the restoration of the hurt and loss: that he would consider, that all the Portuguese (which frequented the shores of Flanders) should by sentence of judgement, suffer all the damages which the Scots had suffered. But the barbarous cruelty of that rash and insatiable man, did frustrate all his determination.

The king also our grandfather (when he had by his letters complained of that injury to the king of Portugal, and had our much professed) gave forth letters of manue, that as, he gave authority to John the eldest son of our grandfather's brother, which was master of that ship laden down, to recover so much of the Lusitan. Before the execution whereof, my grandfather died: after which (my father being yet some young) the whole state of the realm did suppose it best to do nothing in foreign causes, until he came to full age. At some time of sufficient years, he did forbear to grant the letters of manue of manue, till he had first consulted with the king of Portugal thereunto.

an ambassador into him) our father also did (before we could againe hear any word from thence) leaving me a child not past three years old. The which cause, the governing of the kingdom obliged it best (during our minority) to defer these letters of manue, until we came to ripe years: which was done, and without great grief and complaint of their noble and good men.

Whereupon, we also for these last three years (being now grown to ripe age) nothing do provide, that should the other merchants which to that ship of John, have lost their goods and treasure, as also to prevent the harmes of the said John Barton by way of letters of manue before granted, may have private justice done, rather to take so much recompense of the Portuguese. Whereof yet, we thought it best, that they should not be any of them, until we had first by this Summons our request, and before your majesty the whole order of the matter, which is the intended breaking of the peace, the nature of the loss, and the cause of our long silence, allowinge hoping that you will not see any thing, in respect of your humanity and brightness, but that justice shall be good and just. The which, if you desire us to be satisfied, we require your wisdom to consider, that we cannot forgive our injuries without doing so great wrongs, which were about one order to the harm of all nations, the recovery of their goods taken away, which thing ought not to leave to any man (by any means) to be the breaking of friendship, league, or consanguinity, whereunto we have been much affected, when that time shall happen, we desire your excellency to take the same in good part, most willingly confer and consider long, to whom I will long and happy life. From Greenwich, the day before the Jles of April, in the year, 1542.

The king about this time gave liberal pensions to Robert Buchanan, a notable craftsman for making of bell-peers and other guns, to the which liberalitie, he should make some good pieces at the castle of Edinburgh, whereof there are many yet to be seen at Scotland, with this inscription:

This summer the king went on pilgrimage into Saint Dunstons in Gascoigne, and the queen accompanying it, with some household, was brought to bed of a prince, the twenty day of October, the which she died day after was baptised, and named Arthur. Two great ships came south of France to the king, brought with guns, sheaves, and all other kind of munition for warre. Alexander, bastard sonne to the king, with his mother archbishop of Saint Andrews, which had belonged to the same student there in the schools with that famous scholar Erasmus Roterdamus, which was then well come from Flanders to him into Scotland, and was with him received, because he had bestowed his time so well in studies and learning.

perour of Turkie at the citie of Caſtre, who reteined him in ſeruiſe, and gaue him good interteinement, ſo that he remained with him, till he heard that the liuing of Faſt caſtell was fallen to him by lawfull ſucceſſion; notwithſtanding that when he departed out of Scotland, there were eight ſeueral perſons befoze him to ſucceed one after another, which in the meane time were all deceaſed. The 14 of Iulie, Arthur prince of Scotland and the Iles, departed this life in the caſtell of Edenburgh. Two ſcorpions were found, the one quicke, and the other dead, in the orchard of the caſtell of Cragmiller, which thing was reputed for a maruellous great wonder, that anie ſhould be ſene within the Ile of Britaine. In the moneth of September, an vniuerſall ſickenelle reigned hrough all Scotland, whereof manie died. It was verie contagious, and they called it Stope gallant.

There came alſo a paſſing faire woman into Scotland about the ſame time, naming hir ſelfe Katharine Gordon, wiſſe to Perkin Warbecke, that had named himſelfe duke of Porke, but at length being brought to the king, he confeſſed that ſhe was, and ſo auoided the realme. In which meane while, the ladie Katharine Gordon hir ſelfe remained in England, and had right good maintenance, ſo that ſhe liued there verie well and honorable manie yeeres after. Furthermore, the king vpon the eighth day of Nouember comming from Edenburgh to the water of Kile, took diuers miſgouerned perſons, & brought them to Jedworth, where the principall of the Trumbills, with naked ſwords in their hands, and withs about their necks met him, putting themſelues in the kings mercie, which were ſent to ſundrie places to be kept in ward, with diuers other of thoſe countremen, whereby the marches were moze quiet afterwards: and from thence the king paſſed to ſaint Johns towne, where ſuſtice were holden the reſidue of the winter.

The next yeere in the beginning of Maie, the queene went from Dunfermling toward ſaint Dunthois in Roſſe, and was all the way right honozable vſed and interteined. About the tenth of Iulie, ſhe returned to Edenburgh, where ſhe found the lord Dacres, and ſir Robert Durie knight come thither as ambalaſſadors from the king of England hir brother, who were honozable receiued. In the yeere next ſuſuing, in Iune, Andrew Barton being on the ſeas to meet the Boxtingals (againſt whom he had a letter of marque) ſir Edmund Haward lord admerall of England, and the lord Thomas Haward, ſonne and heire vnto the earle of Surrey, were appointed by the king of England to go likewise to ſea with certeine ſhips, and met with the ſaid Andrew as he returned homeward ſore nere to the Dolones, hauing with him onelie one ſhip and one barke.

The Engliſhmen at the firſt made ſigne vnto the Scots as though they ment none euill, ſaue onelie to ſalute them as friends; but getting within them, they ſet vpon them right ſiercelie, and the Scots for a while did as valiantlie defend themſelues, ſo that manie were ſlaine on both ſides: but in the end the Engliſhmen got the vpper hand, wounded Andrew Barton the chiefe capteine of the Scots, that he died of the hurts that he there receiued, and the ſhip called the Unicozne, and the barke called Jennie Peruine, were both taken, with all the Scottiſhmen that remained aliue in the ſame, which were had to London, and ſtaied as priſoners in the biſhop of Porke his houſe for a time, and after ſent home into Scotland. King James was ſore offended with this matter, and therevpon ſent an herald with letters, requiring redreſſe for the ſlaughter of his people, and reſtitution of his ſhips, ſith otherwiſe it might ſeeme to giue occaſion of breach of the peace. But the king of England denied, that the ſlaughter of a pirat (as he toke Andrew Barton to be) ought to breake anie bond of peace, yet neuertheleſſe he promiſed to ſend commiſſioners to the borders, that ſhould intreat of that matter, and other enozmities chanced betwene the two realmes.

About this time was Alexander Hume the onlie gouernoz of all the marches of Scotland (which befoze were accuſtomed to be diuided into three parts) decrelie beloued to king James, being a man of a ſiercer diſpoſition than was conuenient for the profit of the common-wealth. This man promiſed to the king (troubled with the cares of warre, and carefull to wipe awaie the reproch of late receiued by the Engliſh) that ſhortlie he and his folowers with their kindezed and aliances, would ſo bring the matter about, that the Engliſh ſhould as greatlie lament for their loſſes, as they had now conceiued ioies of their victozies. To the performance whereof, he gathered three thouſand ſouldiers, wherewith he entered England, and there ſpoiled ſeuere towneſes befoze anie ſuccour might come to reſcue them: but as he returned backe laden with booties of all kinds, his men (being accuſtomed to pilfries and robberies) impatient of delate, preſentlie diuided the preie in the hoſt, euerie one departing home to his owne as it was nereſt vnto him. Yet Alexander did not diſperſe ſuch as he might keepe together: but aſſembling as manie of them as would tarie, with a ſmall companie abode the end of all things, alwaies hauing an eye to ſee if anie purſute were made after them. But when he perceiued no bodie to follow, and that there was no doubt of danger (paſſing the time moze careleſſe than befoze) he ſell vntowares into the hands of three hundred Engliſh laid in wait for him, who (taking the opportunitie of the time) did ſet vpon him and his, and (driving them into extreme feare) they killed and put to flight all ſuch as they incountered. In which tumult diuers of the Scots were ſlaine, and two hundred taken, of whom George Hume, brother of the ſaid Alexander (exchanged for Comarck, Heron, and Ford, taken priſoners, and long reteined in Scotland for reuenge of the death of Robert Carr) was one, and the chiefeſt, whereby he departed quietlie into Scotland.

The French king and the duke of Gelderland, perceiuing that the king of England was minded through procurement of the pope & others, to make them warres, either of them ſent ambalaſſadors into Scotland vnto king James, requiring his aſſiſtance againſt England: but king James minding to mainteine peace and concord betwixt the parties, ſent an ambalaſſador vnto the king of England, deſiring him in brotherlie and moſt louing wiſe to liue in peace and quietneſſe, and not to make anie wars againſt his confederat friends, offering himſelfe to agree and compound anie difference that was fallen betwixt the king of England and the ſaid princes. The king of England, who had already ſent aid vnto the ladie regent of the lowe countries againſt the duke of Gelderland, made ſuch faire anſwer herevnto as he thought ſtod with reaſon, and ſo diſpatched the ambalaſſador backe againe to his maſter, without anie moze adu in that matter, about the which he came for that time.

About theſe daies, there was called a provinciall ſynod of biſhops, abbats, and other religious perſons at Edenburgh, in the monaſterie of the Dominicke friers, Baſilomane the popes legat being preſent. In which by the common voice of them all (although againſt the will of manie of them) it was ordeined that heretickes or priuie ſtirrings (whole remedies did partly exceed the value of 40 pounds) ſhould pay a pension of the tenth to the pope; and should give to the king (when he required) such summes as he liked to demand: which unto this day is called the Batouane monie or tax. John lord Gordon, sonne and heire to Alexander Gordon erle of Huntley, returned out of France, and was married unto the kings bastard daughter, in Nouember following, in this present were 1512, of whome the house of Huntley is descended.

Shortlie after came the bishop of Murray home, hauing bene at Rome, in France, and England, bringing with him from the pope, and the kings of France and England, manie good and pleasant letters: and with him came a cleark of Spaine in ambassage unto the king. This yere the eleventh day of April, the quene was deliuered of a yong prince in the palace of Luthgo, who was shortlie after baptised, and named James the first prince of Scotland, and of the Isles, that after succeeded his father in the kingdome. The lord Dacres, and doctor West came in ambassage from the king of England, and Monsieur de la Mot came with letters also from the French king, to perswade king James to make warre against England, promising him monie, munition, and all other necessarie provisions of warre. In his waie as he passed the seas towards Scotland, he had botoned thre English ships, & brought seven awaie with him unto Lieth for prizes, in the which were but thre Englishmen left aloue. Shortlie after, maister James Ogilvie abbat of Dunburgh came forth of France with letters of the like effect. After this Robert Barton went to the sea, and in Julie brought into Scotland 14 prizes of English men which he had taken.

About this season, the lord of Drumweidie was slaine in Edinburgh by two persons, which toke sanctuary in Holie rood house, and so escaped. John erle of Atholl deceased the nineteenth of September, & Lion Harold king of armes deceased the first of October. Great misrule was exercised on the borders in this season, and therefore the king assembled the lords in Edinburgh for reformation thereof; and while they were there, the quene was brought to bed of a child, which died shortlie after it was christened. There came a great ship into Scotland; which the king of France had sent unto the king, laden with artillerie, powder, and wines, & then was the league and hand renewed betwixt Scotland and France. The same ship landed at Blackness the nineteenth of Nouember. King James sent a pursuivant called Unicorn into France; and another into England called Flaie, which Flaie requested a safe conduct for an ambassage to be sent from the king his maister unto the king of England: but this would not be granted.

Upon the said Flaies returne, Monsieur de la Mot was sent backe into France, and with him sir Walter Ogilvie, and a messenger whome the pope had sent into Scotland. On the sixteenth of March next ensuing, doctor West came as ambassage into Scotland from the king of England, appointing that certaine commissioners should meet on the borders for redresse of all quarrels betwixt the two realmes, in the moneth of June next ensuing. And this appointment was kept, but no good could be done, as after shall appere. The king sent Forian bishop of Murray into France, to signifie unto the French king the message of the said doctor West, and other things. In the moneth of Maie, there came certeine ships out of Denmark laden with guns, powder, atmoze, & other kind of munition. Also Monsieur de la Mot landed in the west part of Scotland the first day of Maie, with foure ships fraught with wine and flower, and returned againe the nineteenth of the same moneth.

The great Odonell of Ireland came to king James at Edinburgh, the first of June, offering his friendship and seruice to him before all other princes, and speciallie against the king of England; whereupon he was thankfullie receiued, honozable interteined, & richlie rewarded. And so the band of friendship being with him concluded, he returned into his countrie. The king prepared a great nauie of ships, the principall whereof were the Michaele, Margaret, and James. They made saile towards the sea the twentieth seuenth of Julie; and the king sailed in the Michaele himselfe, till they were past the Island of Maie, James Gordon son to George erle of Huntley being one of the captains of the same ship.

The commissioners met on the borders in June, according to the appointment: but because the Englishmen would not consent to make any redresse or restitution, till the fifteenth of October next, thinking by that delate and continuance of time, they should understand the state of their kings proceedings in France, and in the meane time retaine in their hands the Scottishmens goods which they had taken both by sea and land (as the Scottish writers affirm) the king of Scots being thereof aduertised, sent Lion king of armes unto king Henrie then lieng at siege before Teruine, with letters of complaint, commanding him that if king Henrie refused to accomplish the contents of his said letters, he should denounce warre unto him. Whereupon Lion arriving in the English armie with his coife of arms on his backe, about the middelt of August, desired to speake with the king, and was within a short space by Carter chiefe king at arms of England brought to the kings presence, hauing his nobles and counsellors about him, where, with due reuerence, & some good words first uttered, he deliuered his letters, the tenor whereof insueth.

And hereby apperes (as the deed shewes) that ye will nouthet kepe gud waies of iustice and equitie nor kindnes with vs.

The great wrongs and unkindnes done befoze to vs and our lieges we ponderate, quhilk we haue suffred this long time in bpbearing, mainfowering, roundzelling of attemptates, so as the bill of the taken of inhalding of bastard Heron and his complices in your contrie, quha slue our warden vnder trust of daies of meeting for iustice, & thereof was filat & ordeint to be deliuerd, in slaing our liege noblemen, vnder coloz by your folks, in taking of others out of our realme prouonet and chanet by the crags in your cuntrie, withhalding of our wiues legacie promist in your diuerse letters for despite of vs, slaughter of Andro Barton by your awon commaund, quha than had naucht offended to you nor your lieges vnredressit, and breaking of the amity in that behalfe by your deed, and withhalding of our ships and artillarie to your vse.

Quharvpon, eft our diuerse requisitions at your wardens, commissiouners, ambassadors, & your selfe, ye wrote and als them by others vnto vs, that full redresse suld be made at the said meeting of commissiouners, and sa were in hope of reformatioun, or at the lest ye for our sake wald haue desisted fra inuasioun of our friendes and coussings within their awne countries that haue naucht offended at you, as we first required you, in fauour of our tender coussing the duke of Gelder, quham to destroy and disinherit ye sent your folks, and dud what was in them. And right sa we lately desired for our brother & coussing the maist christen king of France, quham ye haue caused to tye his countrie of Millaine, and now inuades his selfe, quha is with vs in second degree of blude, and hafe bene vnto you kind without offense, and moze kindar than to vs.

Notwithstanding, in defense of his person we mon take part, and thereto ye haue cause of others, haue giuen occasion to vs and to our lieges in time by past, nouthet doing iustlie nor kindlie toward vs, proceeding alwaies to the vtter destruction of our nearest friendes, quha mon dow for vs quhan it shall be necessarie; in euill example that ye will hereafter be better vnto vs, quham ye lightly fauour, manifestlie wronged your sister for our sake in contrarie our wits: and laieng to our herauld that we giue you faire wordes, and thinke the contrarie, in deed such it is, we gaue you wordes as ye dud vs, trusting that ye suld haue emended to vs, or worthin kinder to our frends for our sakes, and suld naught haue stopped our seruitoris passage to labour pear, that they mought as the papes halines exhorted vs by his breuites to do. And therebpon we were contented to haue ouerlone our harmes, and to haue remitted the same, though other informatioun was made to our halie father pape Iulie, by the cardinall of Porke, your ambassador.

And sen you haue now put vs fra our gude beleue through the premises, and speciallie in denieng of safe conduct to our seruants, to resort to your presence, as your ambassador doctor West instantlie desired we suld sende one of our counsell vnto you vpon great matters, and appointing of differences debatable betwixt you and vs, furthering of pear if we might, betwixt the most christen king & you, we neuer hard to this purpose safe conduct denied betwixt Infidels. Herefoze we write to you this time at length plainesse of our mind, that we require and desire you to desist fra farther inuasioun and vtter destruction of our brother and coussing the maist christen king, to quham by all confederatioun, blude and alie, and also by new band quhilk you haue compelled vs latelie to take through your iniuries & harmes without remedie done dailie vnto vs, our lieges and subiects, we are bounden and oblist for mutuall defense ilk of others, like as ye & your confederates be oblist for mutuall inuasiouns and actuall warre.

Certifieng you, we will take part in defense of our brother and coussing the maist christen king, and will do what thing we truist may cause you to desist fra pursute of him, and for deuit and postponit iustice to our lieges we mon giue letters of marque according to the amitie betwixt you and vs, quharto ye haue had little regard in time by past, as we haue ordaint our herauld the bearer hereof to say, gif it like you to heare him and gif him credence: right excellent, right high & mightie prince our darest brother and coussing, the trinitie haue you in keeping. Geuen vnder our signet at Edenburgh the twentieth first day of Iulie.

King Henrie having read the letter, and considered thereof with aduise of his counsell, sent for the herauld againe, and told him that he had read and well perceiued the contents of the letters which he had deliuered to him, and would make him answer with condition, condition, that he would promise to declare the same to his maister. Whereunto Lion made this answer: Sir, I am his naturall subiect, and he is my naturall lord, and what he commandeth me to say, I may boldly say with fauour; but the commandements of others I may not, nor dare say vnto my soueraigne lord. But your letters sent by me, may declare your maisters pleasure, albeit your answer requireth doings and not sayings, that is, that you immediatlie should returne home. Then said the king: I will returne at my pleasure to your damage, and not at thy maisters summons. And herewith he caused an answer to be written to the king of Scots, in forme as followeth.

Right excellent, right high & mightie prince, &c. We haue receiued your writing dated at Edinburgh the twentieth first day of Iulie, by your herald Lion this bearer, wherein after rehearfall and accumulation of manie surmised iniuries, griefs and dangers doon by vs and our subiects to you and your lieges, the specialties whereof were superfluous to rehearse, remembzing that to them and euerie of them in effect reasonable answer founded vpon law and conscience, hath tofore bene made to you & your counsell; ye not onelie require vs to desist from further inuasion and vtter destruction of your brother and cosine the French king, but also certifie vs that you will take part in defense of the said king, and that thing which ye trust may rather cause vs to desist from pursute of him, with manie contriued occasions and communications by you causelesse sought & imagined, sounding to the breach of the perpetuall peace passed, concluded, and swozne betwixt you and vs, of which your imagined quarrels causelesse deuised to breake to vs, contrarie to your oth promised, all honoz & kindnesse, we can not maruell; considering the ancient accustomed manners of your progenitozs, which neuer kept longer faith & promise than pleased them.

Howbeit, if the loue and dread of God, mightnesse of bloud, honoz of the world, law and reason had bound you, we suppose ye would neuer haue so farre proceeded, speciallie in our absence. Wherein the pope and all princes christened may well note in you dishonorable demeanour, when ye lieng in wait, seeke the waies to doo that in our said absence, which ye would haue bene well aduised to attempt, we being within our realme and present. And for euident approbation hereof, we need none other proofes nor witnessses, but your owne writings heretofore to vs sent, we being within our realme, wherein ye neuer made mention of taking part with our enimie the French king, but passed the time with vs till after our departure from our said realme. And now percase ye supposing vs so farre from our said realme, to be destitute of defense against your inuasions, haue vttered the old rancour of your mind, which in couert manner ye haue long kept secret.

Neuerthelesse, we remembzing the brittleness of your promise, & suspecting though not wholie believing so much vntedfastnesse, thought it verie expedient and necessarie to put our said realme in a readinesse for resisting of your said enterprises, hauing firme trust in our Lord God, and the righteousnesse of our cause, with the assistance of our confederats & allies, we shall be able to resist the malice of schismatiks and their adherents, being by the generall counsell expresse excommunicate and interdicted; trusting also in time conuenient to remember our friends, and requite you and our enimies, which by such vnaturall demeanour haue giuen sufficient cause to the disherison of you and your posteritie for euer, from the possibilitie that ye thinke to haue to the realme, which ye now attempt to inuade.

And if the example of the king of Nauarre, being excluded from his realme for assistance giuen to the French king, can not restraine you from this vnaturall dealing; we suppose ye shall haue like assistance of the French king, as the king of Nauarre hath now, who is a king without a realme, & so the French king peaceablie suffereth him to continue, whereunto good regard would be taken. And like as we heretofore touched in this our writing, we need not to make anie further answer to the manifold griefs by you surmised in your letter: for so much as if anie law or reason could haue remoued you from your sensuall opinions, ye haue bene manie and oftentimes sufficientlie answered to the same: except onelie to the pretended griefs touching the denieng of our safe conduct to your ambassadoz last sent vnto vs.

Whereunto we make this answer, that we had granted the said safe conduct; and if your herald would haue taken the same with him, like as he hath bene accustomed to solicit safe conducts for merchants and others heretofore, ye might as soone haue had that, as anie other: for we neuer denied safe conduct to anie your lieges to come vnto vs and no further to passe, but we see well, like as your said herald had heretofore made sinister report contrarie to truth, so hath he done now in this case, as it is manifest and open. Finallie, as touching your requisition to desist from further attempting against our enimie the French king, we know you for no competent iudge of so high authoritie to requite vs in that behalfe. Wherefore (God willing) we purpose with the aid and assistance of our confederats and allies to prosecute the same; and as ye doo to vs and our realme, so it shall be remembzed and acquitted hereafter by the helpe of our Lord & our patrone saint George, who right excellent, right high and mightie prince, &c. Dated vnder our signet in our campe before Tirwine, the twelfth day of August.

This

This letter being deliuered vnto the Scottish her-rald, he departed with the same into Flanders, there to haue taken ship: but for want of readie passage he staid, and returned not into Scotland till Flodden field was fought, and the king slaine. For king James perceiuing all the Englishmens doings to tend vnto war rather than to peace, hauing taken order for the assembling of his people, immediatlie after he had sent forth his herald with commandement to denounce the warre, he determined to invade the English confines, and first befoze his maie force was come together, the lord Humes that was lord chamberlaine and warden of Scotland, the thirtieth day of August, hearing that the Englishmen had fetched a bottie within the Scottish ground, assembled a power, & followed them into Northumberland, but yet he could returne he was forelaid [in Brome house, or Brome field] by the Englishmen, which breaking out of their ambushes, put the Scotishmen to the woyle, and of them tooke and slue manie.

Buchan. lib. 13.

These wars thus begun, the king determined to go to his armie (as it seemeth) not yet fullie assembled. Whereupon comming to Lincolne, he went to the church to heare euen-song; as the manner was.
 To whom, after he had entered the chappell, there came an old man, whose heare was somewhat yellowish red, hanging downe vpon his shoulders, his forehead high with baldnesse, bare headed, hauing his bodie couered with a blewish garment, girded with white, and verie reuerent in his countenance.
 This man seeing the king, passed through the com-panie standing there, and drew nere to the king.
 Who being now come vnto him (and with a certaine rude behauiour, leaning vpon the seat wherein the king was placed) in homelie sort saide vnto him: King James sent vnto thee, to giue thee admonish-ment that thou hasten not forward to the place which thou hast determined: which warning if thou dost despise, it shall succeed ill with thee, and with all such as shall attend vpon thee. Further I am commaunded to giue thee intelligence befoze hand, that thou eschue the familiaritie, custome, or counsell of women, and if thou dost otherwise, it shall succeed to thy hurt and reproch. After which thus spoken, he mingled himselfe with the other companie, neither could after be found (the euen-song being ended) when he was sought for by the king: for he was neuer seene after that he had thus deliuered his message. Which seemed the more strange, because that manie which stood nere him (marking all his order, and desirous to haue heard more things from him) could not perceive his departure; amongst which persons (of those that meant to haue asked him further questions) David Lindsay (a man of approued credit and vertue, verie well learned, and whose life was far estranged from lieng and falsehood) was one, who told this same to me (saith Buchanan) as a thing most certaine; or else I would haue ouerpast it as a fable caried about by common report.]

King James approached

 with his power.

The king of Scots made too much hast.

Northam.
 The Bzaies.

In the meane time was the whole power of Scotland assembled, with the which king James approching to the borders, and nothing abashed with the euill lucke thus at the beginning chanced to his people, purposed with greater aduantage of victorie to recover that detriment; and hereupon he made such hast, that he would not staie for the whole power of his realme, which was in preparing to come forward vnto him; but comming to the borders, he passed ouer the water of Tweed the two and twentieth of August, and entered into England, lodging that night at Wellesham nere to the riuer of Tuisell, and the next day laid siege vnto the castell of Northam, and within short space wan the Bzaies, overthrowing the Barnekin, & slue diuerse within the castell, so that the capteine and such as had charge within it, desired the king to delaie the siege, while they might send to the earle of Surreie already come with an armie into the northparts, covenanting if they were not rescued by the nineteenth day of that moneth, they should deliuer the castell vnto the king. This was granted: and because none came within the time to the rescue, the castell was deliuered at the appointed day; a great part of it was overthrowne and beaten downe. After this he wan the castels of Fould and Etell, & diuerse other places of strength, of which part were overthrowne. He also tooke manie prisoners, and sent them away into Scotland, and diuerse he assured: and thus he abode an eigh-teene daies within England, till two parts of his armie were scaled & departed home from him, which they did vpon this occasion.

Barnekin.

Fould and Etell taken.

The king was determined & persuaded to haue besieged Berwicke (beyond which he was now passed) since the same alone was more hono- (than all the other places besides) if they wan it; the taking whereof they supposed not to be verie hard, because they were sure that the towne and castell were unfurnished of all things for the defense thereof.
 Whereupon, the king (deeming nothing too hard for his armie, especiallie, since the English were set on worke as much as they might in the French wars) being nourished in that vanitie (by his flattering courtiers) did leaue the same vndone at this time, meaning in his returne easilie to haue obtained it.
 But as they were yet at Fould, a herald of the English came vnto them, requiring that they would appoint a day and place, where and when both the armies might foine in battell. Whereupon, there was a counsell called amongst the Scots, in which it was agreed by the greater part, that the Scots should returne home into their countrie, least with so small a companie they might hazard the state of the whole countrie; especiallie, since that they had already sufficientlie obtained fame, glorie and riches, and to the vttermost satisfied the band of amitie with the French; for there was no iust cause, why they for number (so few) and for trauell (in overthrowing so manie forts) so much weakened, should now againe be laid open to so great a multitude of the English daile increasing with succors. For it was said at that time; that Thomas Howard brought into the field (besides the rest of his armie) 6000 of chosen and valiant souldiers from the English campe (in France) befoze Turweine.

Fr. Thin.

Buchan. lib. 13.

To which persuasion (to make the matter more strange) it was further added, that if the king did depart; the English host of necessitie must be dissol-ued, and could not that yeare againe be repaired, because their souldiers were set from the furthest parts of the realme; and that if the king would needs fight, that he then should doo it in his owne realme, keeping the time & place in his power alwaies to be appointed. But when the French ambassador (and cer-teine other, fed with the French pensions) labored to the contrarie; the king being by nature fierce, and greedy of warre, was easilie persuaded to abide his enimie in that place. In the meane time, when the English came not forth (at the day appointed to them by the herald, which befoze had bene with the Scots) the noblemen of Scotland, taking occasion thereof, did afresh go to the king, declaring that their not comming to battell was onelie a traine and deceit, deferring the matter from day to day, to the end that their force might be increased, and the Scots diminished.

Wherefore said they, we should vse the like policie against them. For since they haue not attended the time prescribed vnto them, it is no shame to the Scots to retorne into their countrie without battell, or to fight within their owne limits. Of both which, the surer counsell were to follow the first; which if it be not liked, then is there good occasion offered to execute the other. For since the river of Till (hauing his banks) is not passable, but at certeine miles hence (except it be by a bridge) some few may there resist a great multitude. Besides which, when a part of the English armie is passed the bridge, the same bridge maie easilie (by engines placed therfore) be cut in sunder; so that there shall not be passage for anie more: by means whereof, the one part of them shall be subdued on the one side of this riuer, before that anie aid can come vnto them from the other banke. The king liked neither of these deuises and persuasions; but answered, that he would not suffer the English to depart (unfoughten with) although there were an 100000 against him. At which rath answer, the whole nobilitie was greivoulie offended.

Whereupon Archembald Dologlas earle of Angus (which farre excelled all the others both in pées and authoritie) laboured to turne the kings mind with all gentle persuasions, and began to make a more ample discourse vpon the two former counsels giuen by the nobilitie. For he shewed that the king had fullie satisfied the request of the French, in that he had now turned the greatest part of the English armie before bent against the French, against himselfe and his owne people; and had so wrought, that those great armies should neither hurt France nor doe anie iniurie vnto the Scots, sith they were not able long to remaine in campe in those cold places, and in a barren countrie unfurnished of all things (by the calamities of the last warres) and in which there was no corne; and if there were, it could not be ripened (the winter comming on so fast) in those northerne parts of the realme.

And where the French ambassadoz doth so much bge vs vnto the battell, I suppose that the same should not seeme either new or strange vnto vs, that a strange man (which doth not respect the common euill of the realme, but the priuat commoditie of his owne nation) be ouer laushy in powring out the bloud of other men. Besides which, his request is ouer impudent, to demand of the Scots that which the French king (a man of singular experience and wisdom) doth not iudge conuenient for his owne kingdome or dignitie, if we be ouerthrowne. Yetther should the losse of his host seeme more light vnto him (although we are few in number) because that all they of Scotland (which excell in force, authoritie or counsell) are assembled here togither, who being slaine, the rest of the realme would some be a preie to the victor. What? Is it more safe for vs, and more profitable to the eschewing of all danger, for him to fight at this present? No trulie. For if Lewis do suppose, that the English (by imagined meanes) may be either made needie of monie, or else wteried by delaie; what can be done more necessarie for the present state of things, than to compell the enimie to diuide his armie; to the end that we may ease the weight of warre against the French by one part of the host to be sent against vs, and still to hold them plate as it were alwaies to keepe them readie to set vpon vs, & by removing to giue them cause to follow vs? For so I suppose shall the glorie and shew (which these men I feare rather valliant in words than deeds, do with their rashnesse so much pretend) be fullie answered. For what can happen more honorable to the king, than that we (by the ouerthrow of so manie castles, by the spoile of so manie countreies with sword and fire, and by the drining home of so great hosties and preies) haue done that iniurie to them, as that their countrie shall not by the peace of manie pées recover his former estate? What greater profit may we loke for by warre, than in so great tumult of warres, with great praise and honor to vs, and with shame and reproch to our enimies, to obtaine quiet, ioined with gaine and glorie for the refreshing of our selues? Which kind of victorie (that is gotten more by words than by swordes) chieflie belongeth to men, and of men speciallie to the leaders and capteins, as such a glorie whereof the common souldiours may not challenge anie part.

Which being thus spoken by earle Dologlas, although all they which were present seemed (by their countenance) to giue consent thereto: yet the king (who had with other bound himselfe to fight with the English) receiued these counsels with contrarie cares; and in heat commanded Dologlas to depart home, if he were afraid of the enimie. Whereupon he (conceiuing some unkindnesse, and inwardlie beholding wherevnto all these things would come by the kings rashnesse) forthwith burst out in teares. After which (as soone as he could settle himselfe thereto) he spake these few words. If (said he) my former life did not cleare me from the reproch of a coward, I know not with what reason or persuasion I might cleare or defend my selfe. For trulie so long as this my bodie was able to susteine anie labor, I neuer spared to spend the same in the defense of my countreies helpe, and my souereignes honor. But since I see their cares to exclude my counsell (which is the onelie thing wherewith I can now be profitable) I here leaue my two sonnes (who next vnto my countrie are most deare to me) and the rest of my kinned (of whom I greatlie account) as a certeine pledge of the truth and loue of my mind towards thee, and the common helpe of my countrie. And I pray God that he make this feare of mine to be false, and that I may rather be counted a lieng prophet, than behold those things which I feare will happen vnto vs. Which words when the Dologlas had said to the king, he departed thence with his companie. The rest of the nobilitie (because they saw they could not draw the king to their mind) took that place for battell which was next vnto them, to the end (seeing they were much inferior in number to their enimies, for there were 26000 fighting men in the English armie, as it was knowne by the scouts) to defend themselves with the benefit of the place, and thereupon got the hill next vnto their campe.)

In which meane time, the earle of Surrie, lieutenant to the king of England, hauing raised all the power of the north parts of England, came with the same towards the place where he heard that king James was incamped, and approaching within three miles of the Scottish campe in full sight of the Scottishmen, pitcht downe his tents, and incamped with his whole armie. Although king James had great desire to fight with his enimies thus lodged in full view of his campe; yet because he was incamped in a place of great aduantage, so as the enimies could not approach to fight with him, but with great losse and danger to cast themselves away, he thought good to keepe his ground, speciallie because all those of the nobilitie, who were knowne to be of experience, did not hold with their aduise that counselled him to giue battell.

At what time the earle of Surrie had sent an officer at armes vnto him, requiring him to come forth of his strength vnto some indifferent ground, where he would be readie to encounter him, & name the earle of Huntley, a man for his high valliantie ioined with wisdom and policie, had in most reputation of all the residue, affirmed in plaine words [besides that which Dologlas had before said] that nothing could be either more fond or foolish, than to fight at pleasure of the enimie, and to set all on a maine chance at his will and appointment, and therefore it should be good for them to remaine there in place of aduantage, and with prolonging the time to trifle with the enimie, in whose campe there was already great scarcitie of vittels, neither was it possible that they should be vittelled from the inner parts of the realme, by reason of the cumbersome waies for cariage to passe now after such abundance of continuall raine as of late was fallen, and not like as yet to ceasse, so that in sitting still and attempting nothing rashlie without aduisement, the king should haue his enimies at his pleasure, as vanquished without stroke stricken through disadvantage of the place, and lacke of vittels to susteine their languishing bodies.

His persuasions.

For the weather.

And suerlie beside the want of vittels, the soule and euill weather sore annoied both parties: for there had not bene one faire day, no scarce one houre of faire weather of all the time the Scottish armie had lien within England, but great cold, wind & raine, which had not onelie caused manie of the Scots to returne home, but also sore vexed the Englishmen, as well in their iourne thitherwards, as also while they lay in campe against the Scottish armie. There was sending of messengers betwixt them to and fro, and the king had sent his quarell in writing vnto the earle of Surrie by his herald Flaie the night before the battell, containing as followeth.

Where it is alledged that we are come into England against our bond and promise, thereto we answer: that our brother was bound as farre to vs as we were to him, and when we swore last before his ambassadors in presence of our counsell, we expressed speciallie in our oth, that we would keepe to our brother, if our brother kept to vs, and not else. We swore that our brother brake first to vs, and of his breach we required him diuers times of amends: and latelie we warned him, as he did not vs yet we brake. And this we take for our quarell, and by Gods grace shall defend the same at your assixed time, which with Gods helpe we shall abide. Thus was the king verie desirous to trie the matter by battell, although the wisest sort of his nobles wished not that he should doe any thing ouer rashlie.

The buckle leather of his helmet gnawed with mice. The cloth of his tent of bloodie colour.

There chanced also manie things taken (as yet would say) for warnings of some great mischance to follow, which though some reputed but as vaine and casuall haps; yet the impression of them bred a certeine religious feare and new terror in his heart. For as he was in counsell with his lords, to understand their opinions touching the order of his battels, there was an hare start amongst them, which hauing a thousand arrowes, daggers, and other kind of things bestowed at him, with great noise and shouting, yet he escaped from them all safe and without hurt. The same night also, mice had gnawed in sunder the buckle and leather of his helmet where with he should fasten the same to his hed. And moreover, the cloth or veile of his inner tent (as is said) about the breake of the day, appeared as though the deawie moisture thereof had bene of a blondie colour.

Hereupon the king keeping himselfe within his tent, the earle of Surrie constrained by necessitie to take all waies whereby to traine the king downe from the hill where he was lodged, remoued his campe towards the hills of Floddon, where the king of Scots late incamped: and on the ninth day of September passed the water of Till at Twissell bridge; the reterward going ouer at Whilford, putting themselves as nere as they could betwixt the Scottish campe and Scotland. King James perceiving the Englishmen to passe the water, iudged that they had ment to win an hill that late betwixt them and his campe, and therefore to prevent them, he caused his field to be raised, and fier to be set on the litter & cabins which they had made of boughs, and so with all speed remoued to the other hill, being gotten thither per the Englishmen could perceive him to be remoued out of his former lodgings, because the smoke of the fiers which the Scots had made, covered all the countrie betwixt the two armies.

In the meane while were the Englishmen aduanced to the foot of Floddon hill, hauing thereby gotten double aduantage: for the Scottish ordinance could not much annoie them in marching vnto the hill, and they againe might gall the Scots in shooting off at them, as they came downewards vpon them. For king James hauing disappointed the Englishmen of the hill, thought verelie it should be an easie matter for him to ouerthrow them, which being put beside the place where they intended (as he thought) to haue camped, would neuer abide the countenance of his puissant armie, if he might attaine to ioine with them. Therefore the Scottish armie [after they had appointed the same into three wards, whereof (as saith Lefleus) the earle of Huntley and the lord Hume led the right wing, the left had the earle of Crawford and Pontrolle; and the king himselfe kept the middle ward, with the earles of Argyle and Lennor] making downewards, incountered with the English host nere to the foot of the mountaine called Brannton, and first sir Edmund Haward leading one of the out wings of the English armie, hauing with him three thousand men, being fiercelie assailed by the Scots on foot, hauing speares and long weapons, and also by certeine horsemen, was in the end discomfited, and his people beaten downe and put to flight, so that being of them forsaken, he was constrained to follow. But yet he and diuerse other which escaped, ioined themselves to the next battell as well as they might. This so prosperous a beginning, who would thinke should haue turned to the losse of the Scots part, and aduancement of the English side. But so it came to passe, for king James no sooner saw that wing of the English host overthrowne and discomfited, but that he deemed how all the whole power of the Englishmen had bene fleeing away: and therefore alighting beside his horse, and commanding those that were about him to follow, prepared himselfe to pursue the chase.

His capitaine did what they could by words to remoue him from his purpose, declaring to him the dutie of a prince: which is not rashlie to enter the fight, but to prouide and see that euerie thing be done in order: and whereas comming to trie the matter by hand blowes, he can doe no more than another man; yet keeping his place as apertineth to his person, he may be worth manie thousands of other. The king nothing moued with these exhortations, breaking his arrais of battell, with a companie of noble men, rushed forward into the fore ward, where accomplishing the office of a footman, he found the Englishmen not fleeing, but manfullie standing at resistance, resistance, so that there was a right hard encounter, and manie arrowes shot on euerie side, and great hurt done therewith.

At length sir Edward Stanlie with the reregard of the Englishmen came fiercelie downe from the hill of Bzanton, vpon the backe of the kings armie, wherein they fought cruellie on both parts for a long space; but at length the victorie inclined to the Englishmen. For the king himselfe was there beaten downe and slaine, with all that whole battell which first entered the fight. The other part of the Scottish host, whereof Alexander Hume lord chamberlaine had the gouernance, although he saw where the other Scottishmen were in danger, and closed in on euerie side, yet would he not once remoue one foot forward out of the place (where he stood) to aid them. Whereupon, the lacke of discretion in the king, which would needs run vpon his owne death, amazed the minds of all men, and brought them into such perplexitie, that they knew not what to do; but looked one vpon another without stirring to or fro, as those that were in despaire now after the death of their king to recover the victorie, which by so strange a chance seemed as it were slipped out of their hands.

Whombeit, the lord chamberlaine bare the most blame, for that he did not cause a new onset to be giuen. But it happened well for the Englishmen: for if king James had ordered himselfe wisely in this battell, or that after he was slaine, a new furie had moued the Scots to haue renewed the fight in reuenge of the kings death, as had bene expedient, the victorie vndoubtedlie had bene theirs (as was thought by men of great vnderstanding.) Whereupon the Englishmen remembering how manifestlie Gods godnesse appeared towards them in this battell, confessed themselves long after bound to God for their safetie and deliuerance out of that present danger. The fight began about foure of the clocke in the after none, and continued three houres, in the which fiftene thousand men were slaine on both parts: and of that number a third part at the least was of Englishmen (as was credible reported) but (as our English writers affirme) there died of Englishmen not past fiftene hundred.

But yet the Scottishmen hold, that there died more of the Englishmen than of their nation at this field, and that manie thought it was not the bodie of king James which the Englishmen found in the field, and toke it for his; but rather an other Scottish mans corps, called the lard of Bonehard, who was also slaine there. And it was affirmed by sundrie, that the king was seene the same night aliue at Kelso: and so it was commonlie thought that he was liuing long after, and that he passed the seas into other countries, namelie to Ierusalem to visit the holie sepulchre, and so to dye forth the residue of his daies, in doing penance for his former passed offences: but he appeared not in Scotland after as king, no more than Charles duke of Burgognie did appeare in his countries after the battell of Pannie, although his people had the like vaine opinion that he escaped from that discomfiture aliue.

But now to returne to the truth of the matter where we left. In the night folowing after this terrible battell, the residue of the Scottish armie returned homewards the same way they came, waisting and spoiling the English borders as they passed. At their comming home, euerie man spake euil of them, for that as cowards and naughtie persons, they neither sought to reuenge the death of their noble king, nor yet to succour their fellowes that were beaten downe and slaine befoze their faces. But namelie Alexander Hume lord chamberlaine was reproued, as cause of all that mischief, which beued himselfe not as a captetne, but as a traitor or enimie to his countrie. * Upon the honoz of this victorie, Thomas Howard earle of Surrie (as a note of the conquest) gaue to his seruants this cognifiance (to weare on their left arme) which was a white lion (the beast which he befoze bare as the proper ensigne of that house) standing ouer a red lion (the peculiar note of the kingdome of Scotland) and tearing the same red lion with his pawes.]

Thus haue you heard how through rashnesse and lacke of skilfull order, the Scottish armie was ouercome, and that worthie prince king James the fourth brought to his fatall end, on the ninth day of September, in the twentie and fift yere of his reigne, and thirtie and ninth of his age, which was in the yere from the incarnation 1513. For his politike gouernment and due administration of iustice, which he exercised during the time of his reigne, he deserved to be numbred amongst the best princes that euer reigned ouer the Scottish nation. All theft, reiffe, murder, and robberte ceased in his daies, by such rigorous erection of lawes penall as he caused to be exercised throught all the bounds of Scotland: insomuch that the savage people of the out Isles sorted themselves throught terror and dread of due punishment to liue after the order of lawes and iustice, where otherwise of themselves they are naturallie inclined to sedition, & disquieting of each other. To conclude, men were in great hope, that if it had pleased the hie determinate power of almightie God to haue lent to him longer life, he should haue brought the realme of Scotland to such a flourishing estate, as the like in none of his predecesors times was yet euer heard of.

There died with him in that infortunate battell, of noble men (beside others of the meaner sort) the archbishop of saint Andrews his bastard sonne, the bishop of the Isles: the abbats of Inchaffreie and Kilwenne: the earles of Montrose, Crawford, Argyle, Lennor, Glencar, Cathnes, Castelles, Bothwell, Arrell high constable of Scotland, Abbell, Atholl, and Porton: the lords Louet, Forbes, Clouston, Ross, Fenderbie, Saintcleare, Forbell, and his three brethren, Daunlie, Sempill, Bothicke, Bogonie, Arskill, Blackater, and Cowin: knights and gentlemen of name, sir John Douglas, Cathbert Hume of Fast castle, sir Alexander Seton, sir Dauid, maister John Grant, sir Dunkin Catfield, sir Sander Lotoder, sir George Lotoder, maister Marshall, maister Key, maister Elliot, maister Catwell clerke of the chancerie, the deane of Elfeffer, Packe bene, Packe Clene, with manie others.

* This James the fourth was of a firme bodie, of iust stature, of most comelie countenance, and of sharpe wit, but altogether vnlearned, as the fault of that age was. But he did diligentlie applie himselfe to an old custome of the countrie, cunninglie to cure wounds, the knowledge whereof in times past was a thing common to all the nobilitie, being alwaies vsed to the warres. He was easilie to be spoken vnto, gentle in his answers, iust in his iudgements, and so moderat in punishments, that all men might easilie see he was vntwilliglie drawn vnto them. Against the detraction of the euil, and admonishment of the good, there was such worthinesse of mind in him (confirmed by the quiet of a good conscience, and the hope of his innocencie) that he would not onelie not be angrie, but not so much as vse a sharpe word vnto them. Amongest which vertues, there were certeine vices crept in by the ouermuch desire to please the people, for whilst he labored to auoid the note of couetousnesse (objected to his father) and sought to win the fauour of the common sort (with sumptuous feasts, gorgeous shewes, and large gifts) he fell into

lib. 12.

After the death of that worthy prince king James the fourth, slain at Banrton (as before ye haue heard) his sonne James the fift succeeded him: for after the returne of those that escaped from the said field, the queene assembled the lords and estates of the realme together at Striueling, where the 21 day of September 1513, his sonne the foresaid James the fift, a child of one yere, nine moneths, & ten daies of age, by vniuersall aduise and consent was crowned king, and his mother the queene appointed regent of the realme, vsing the counsell of the reuerend father James Beton archbishop of Glasgow, the earles of Huntlye, Angus, and Arrane. * This gouvernement the queene obtained by reason of hir husbands testament, who making his last will (before that he went to the warres) did appoint thereby that the whole administration of all things should remaine with hir, so long as she continued a widow: the which though it were against the custome of the countrie (being the first example of a womans gouvernement amongst the Scots) yet it seemed tolerable to most men (giuen to peace) especiallie since there were not men sufficient at that time for honor and experience to take that charge in hand, by occasion of the great slaughter of the nobles at Flodden field, which gouvernement she did not long enjoy.]

For shortly after they fell at variance amongst themselves, about the bestowing of those benefices which were vacant by the deaths of those persons which had bene slain at the field; by reason whereof, some of them wrote letters secretly into France to John duke of Albanie, willing him to come into Scotland to be tutor to the king, and gouernor of the realme, as he that was next of blood to the king, and nearest to the crowne, in case the kings children deceased without issue. He therefore sent monsieur de la Bautie into Scotland, who in companie of the earle of Arrane, the lord Fleming, and Lion the herald (which long had bene in France) landed on the west coast the third of Nouember. And shortly after, the said monsieur de la Bautie deliuered his letters to the queene and lords, who thereupon met at saint Johns towne, and there by vniuersall consent it was accorded, that the duke of Albanie should be admitted tutor and gouernor to the king & realme, and that the same should be confirmed in parlement by the three estates which should be kept at Edinburgh, the thirtenth day of March next, for the same intent.

To rehearse the troubles and great disquietnesse that chanced, during the minoritie of this king, thorough lacke of one administration of iustice, and by discord & variance daily rising amongst the lords & peeres of the realme, a man might haue iust cause greatly to wonder thereat, and in seeing the same thoroughlie, no lesse lament the oppression done to the poore commons in that wicked and most miserable time, when iustice seemed to sleepe, and rapine with all the other sorts and rabble of inturious violence invaded hir emptie seat, triumphing ouer all as a conqueror. * During the times of which disorder, there was (amongest those which preyed and spoiled others) a great capitaine of the same faction, called Macrobert Struan, who (ouerrunning Atholl and the adjoining places) was accompanied for the most part with eight hundred thieues, and sometime more. Which Struan was at length (whilest he spoiled euerie man at his owne pleasure, and at that time remaining with his uncle John Creighton) taken by

The queene sent louing letters vnto the king of England his brother, requiring him of peace. Whereupon a truce was taken betwixt the two realmes of England and Scotland, for the space of one yere and a day. In the beginning of Februarie, the king of England, hearing that a parlement should be holden in Scotland, for the bringing in of the duke of Albanie to be tutor, wrote to his sister that she should in anie wise impeach and staie his comming thither; declaring how dangerous it was, not onelie for hir, but also for his sonne to haue him gouernor, which was to succed, if his son were once out of the way. But the chieffest cause that moued the king of England to labour, that the duke should haue nothing to do in Scotland, was (as manie thought) for that he knew how the duke, in fauour of the king of France, would shew himselfe an enimie against England, with all the force he might make or procure.

Now shortly after that the peace was concluded betwixt him and the king of France, he sent a letter also, requiring him not to suffer the duke to passe into Scotland, for the reason first alleged. But notwithstanding the labor that king Henrie made to the contrarie, it was concluded by the states in parlement assembled in Edinburgh, at the time prefixed, that sir Patrike Hamilton, and Lion king of armes should be sent into France, to procure the duke to come into Scotland, being now confirmed tutor and gouernor, according to the lawes of the realme in such cases provided. Whereupon, in Aprill then next following they took the seas, and passed into France, accordinglie as by the states had bene desired.

This yere came a legat into Scotland from the pope, with certeine priuileges granted to the king and realme. The thirtieth of Aprill was the queene deliuered of a prince in the castell of Striueling, which was baptised by the postulat of Dunfirmling, and the archdeane of saint Andzewes, and instantly confirmed by the bishop of Cathnesse, by the name of Alexander. During the time that the queene lay in childbed, great discord fell out betwixt the lords of the west parts, and the other lords of the realme: but shortly after the queene called an assemble at Edinburgh the twelfth of Iulie, where they were all well agreed. And herewith two of the cleargie were sent into England for peace. And the 28 of the same moneth, maister James Ogilvie abbat of Dunburgh, and sir Patrike Hamilton, and Lion the herald came forth of France with articles in writing from the king there, and the duke of Albanie; by the which the dukes comming was excused, because the king could not want him, till some end were had touching the warres betwixt him and the king of England, which was concluded in October next ensuing.

This yere, the first of August, the queene married Archemald Dologlasle earle of Angus, and immediately after in saint Johns towne took the great seale from the bishop of Glasgow, that was chancellor of the realme. Whereupon the said bishop got him to Edinburgh, where manie lords assisted him, and kept out the queene and his new husband, so that they might not enter there: whereof great discord rose within the realme amongst the nobles and peeres of the same. In the peace contracted betwixt Lewis the twelfth of that name, king of France, and Henrie the eight king of England, no mention was made of the realme of Scotland: for the which the Scottishmen thought great salt in the French king, seeing that for his cause the warre had bene attempted betwixt them and England. boat the twentieth fift of October, William Elphing-ston bishop of Aberdeen, and lord keeper of the priuie scale departed this life at Edinburgh. He had bene a faithfull counsellor to James the third & to James the fourth, by whose helpe he founded and indowd the college in the old towne of Aberdeen, for the increase of learning & vertue, which hath flourished with good wits of students ever since, till these our daies.
The 20 of Nouember, Le sire de la Bantie receiued the castell of Dunbar in the name of the duke of Al-banie, at the hands of the deane of Glasgow brother to the bishop of Murray, called Forzman. Shortly after, John Hepburne the prior of saint Andrews then elect archbishop of that see, besieged the castell of saint Andrews, and wain it by force from the keepers of it, which were appointed to defend it in the name of Gawin Dowlaglas, wherewith the quene and the earle of Angus were highly offended. The twelfth of Ianuarie, being a verie darke & windie night, the earle of Lennor, and the maister of Glencarne undermined the nether groundsoile of the castell gate of Dunbretton, & entered thereby into the castell, & so toke it, putting out thereof the lord Cr-skine. Shortly after (that is to say) the fifteenth of that moneth, a great assemblie was made betwixt the earles of Angus and Arrane, the one to haue fought with the other, which was the cause and beginning of great trouble that ensued.

Contention about the in-late of saint Andrews.

The same day in Edinburgh were the bulls published, which Forzman the bishop of Murray had purchased at Rome, for the obtaining of the archbishop-ricke of saint Andrews, the abbacies of Dunfermeling, and Arbroeth, through supplication of the quene and duke of Albanie. From which bulls the prior of saint Andrews appealed, pretending title to the arch-bishopricke by election and generall gift of the lords of the realme; and herupon got together his friends in Edinburgh, as the maister of Hales and others.
And on the other part, the lord chamberleine, and di-uerse of the bishop of Murreis friends got the kings letters, by vertue wherof they proclaimed the said maister of Hales, and the prior of saint Andrews rebels, with all their assistants, putting them to the horne: wherupon they were constrained to depart out of Edinburgh. And in Maie following, the prior went vnto Rome, there to iustifie his appeale.

The foure and twentieth of Februarie, a parlement was assembled at Striueling; but because the lords could not agree amongst themselves, it was prolonged till the coming of the duke of Albanie, which was looked for to be in Scotland, in Aprill; or at the furthest in Maie next ensuing, as he had sent word by sir John Striueling of the heire, that was latelie come from him with letters vnto the lords and pères of the realme. The fifteenth of Maie, truce was proclaimed betwixt England and Scotland, to indure for thre yeares, or thre moneths (as saith Lesleus) but the same day at six of the clocke in the afternone, the Englishmen entered the borders of Scotland vpon the water of Rule, and forraied the countrie, doing great hurt therein, notwithstanding the truce. The seuenteenth day of Maie, John duke of Albanie, tutor and gouernor of Scotland, arriued at the towne of Ayr, with eight ships well appointed, and furnished with men and all kind of necessarie prouision for his estate.

ging and met him, to doo him honor. Sundrie con-ceits, pageants, & plaies were shewed by the burgeses, to honor his entrie in the best maner they could deuise. Shortly after his coming to Edinburgh, there came thither forth of all parts of the realme, the lords and barons, where they being assembled in counsell, he toke vpon him the gouernement of the realme, which he promised to vse by their aduise, so that they would assist him in setting forth of iustice and good orders, which they undertooke to doo.

Hereupon was the parlement, which had bene prolonged till his coming, summoned to be kept at Edinburgh the twelfth of Iulie, in the which diuerse acts were concluded and made; and the lord Dummond was adiudged in the dukes mercie, for striking Lion king of armes. The duke pardoned him of life and honor, but his lands and goods remained in the kings hands: notwithstanding, he was afterwards restored to the same againe. In this parlement also, the duke of Albanie was confirmed by the thre estates of the realme tutor and gouernor to the king, the scepter and sword being deliuered to him: his oth also was taken by the lords, and theirs giuen to him, that each of them should be faithfull to others, and namelie to their king and soueraigne lord, and also should mainteine iustice to the vttermost of their powers, for the aduancement of his honor, and suertie of the realme.

In the meane time, whilest this parlement was in hand, the gouernor was aduertised that the king should haue bene conueied forth of the realme secretlie into England: wherupon he suddenlie departed in the night time from Edinburgh, with his men of warre in good order, & came to Striueling, where the king, with his brother Alexander, laie with the quene; which castell, together with the kings person, and the other within it, were deliuered to him the third day of August: wherupon he committed them and the castell to the keeping of foure lords of the realme, whereof the earles of Eglington and Montrose were two. The lord Hume, because he had assisted the earle of Angus and the quene against the gouernor, was denounced a rebell; and the earles of Lennor & Arrane, with manie others, were sent to his houses to seize the same into the kings hands. In the castell of Hume was laid gunpowder by a traine, wherby diuerse of them that entered first into the castell were burned.

The lord Hume himselfe got him into England, and soze disquieted the marches, so that no day of truce was holden, neither on the east nor middle marches. The twelfth of August, the quene, the earle of Angus, and his brother George Dowlglas, went from Temptallon vnto Berwike, and from thence passed to the nuncie of Caudestream; wherupon aduertisement being giuen to the k. of England, and his pleasure therein knowne, the six and twentieth of that moneth she was receiued by the lord Dacres, & conueied to Harbottell castell, where she remained till she was deliuered of a daughter, called Margaret Dowlglas, afterwards married to the earle of Lennor, as in place conuenient it shall further appeare. There was no Scottishman at this time receiued into England with hir. The gouernor perceiuing the rebellion of the lord Hume, passed to the borders with his Frenchmen, where the six of October, the said lord Hume came & submitted himselfe to the gouernors pleasure, and his brother Alexander shortly after did the same, and they were both deliuered to the earle of Arrane, who was appointed to keepe them in safetie within the towne of Eden-burgh.

But the twelfth of October next ensuing, the said earle of Arrane departed from thence in the night season, with those his prisoners, scaling their waies on foot. Hereupon, the gouernour causing the parlement to be holden that was summoned to begin the foure and twentieth of October, the said lord Hume, maister William Hume, and David Hume, were conuict of treason by all the states, to lose their liues, lands, and goods. This parlement was proroged till fiftene daies after, within which time the earle of Arrane was appointed to make appearance, or else it was agreed that they should proceed against him in like manner. And in that meane space, the gouernour went to besiege the castell of Hamilton, where that noble aged ladie, the old countesse of Arrane, daughter to king James the second, & mother to the earle of Arrane, and aunt to the duke by his fathers side, caused not onelie the castell to be surrendered at the dukes pleasure, but procured also the earle of Arrans peace, which earle, the twelfth of Nouember next ensuing, came with the bishop of Glasgou vnto Edinburgh, and there submitted himselfe to the dukes will.

About the same time, certeine lords toke part with the earle of Murreie the kings bastard brother, and the earle of Erroll, against the erle of Huntleie, and raised a commotion; so that being got into Edinburgh, there was much adoe, & the towne greatly disquieted. The gouernour lieng in the abbey, came into the towne, and toke the earles of Huntleie, Erroll, Murreie, and others; and committed them to ward within the castell, while he tried the cause, and finding that maister William Haie being with the earle of Murreie had raised that stirre, he sent the same Haie into France, there to remaine during his pleasure, and forthwith the said earles were set at libertie. Lion king of armes appointed to go into England with letters to king Henrie, was stopped at Caldstreame by the lord Hume, who toke his letters from him, and kept him prisoner, till Alexander Humes mother, that remained prisoner in Dunbar, was exchanged for him. The eighteenth day of December, Alexander duke of Rossie the kings brother departed this life at Striueling.

The seuenteenth day of Januarie, a truce was taken betwixt Egglan and Scotland, till the feast of Pentecost next. This truce was agreed vpon at Coldingham, by certeine commissioners, appointed on either part there, to treat for peace. For the realme of Scotland were these: Monsieur de Plaines the French ambassadoz, archdeacon of saint Andrews, maister Gavin de Dunbar, and sir William Scot of Baluerie knights. The Englishmen comprised for their part, the earle of Angus and the lord Hume within the compasse of this truce. In the meane time, the earle of Arrane departed from the gouernour againe, and repaired to the west parts, where he confederated himselfe with certeine lords, notwithstanding that sir James Hamilton, and the lord of Cauder remained pledges for his good demeanour within the castell of Edinburgh. The earles of Lennox, Glencarne, and other caused the castell of Dunbretton and diuerse other to be furnished, and toke the castell of Glasgou with the kings great artillerie that laie within it, and spoiled the same.

The gouernour aduertised thereof, raised an armie & went to Glasgou, where, by the laboz of the bishop of that place, an appointment was taken, so that the castell was deliuered into the bishops hands. The earle of Lennox came in to the gouernour, and toke a new respit, and about the beginning of March next following, the earle of Arrane and the lord Hume did the like. Forman the archbishop of saint Andrews, against whome the prior of saint Andrews did stand (as ye haue heard) for that same benefice, to the great diquieting of the realme, by such partakers as chanced thereabout among the lords, came not to the towne of Edinburgh, and resigned all the three benefices, whereof he had purchased bulls of the pope, that is to say, the archbishopricke of saint Andrews, the abbasies of Arbroth and Dunfermling in the gouernours hands; to bestow the same at his pleasure: wherby the counsell of certeine lords, to satisfie such as claimed interest to the same, and pacifying of all debates, bestowed them as followeth.

First, the said archbishopricke he gaue to the said Forman with the abbasies of Dunfermling, and to maister James Hepburne he gaue the bishopricke of Murray, and benefices worth a thousand marks by the yeare vnto the prior of saint Andrews for a recompense; the abbasie of Dunburgh he gaue vnto maister James Ogilvie, and the bishopricke of Aberdeen (then vacant) vnto Alexander Gordon, and to the archbishop of Glasgou called Beton he gaue the abbasie of Arbroth, assigning to the earle of Murray a large pension out thereof. One of the Hamiltons was made abbat of Kilwinning, and George Dundas was made prior of the knights of the roads. And thus he bestowed the benefices which had bene vacant euer since Flodden field, vnto diuerse lords, or to their kinsmen, that by such liberalitie shew towards them, all debates and discords might cease, which had happened amongst them, specially about the bestowing of the same benefices. This was done in the moneth of Februarie.

Shortlie after, the gouernour, by counsell of the lords, to the end the realme might come to a perfect quietnesse, and the noble men vnited together, received into fauor the earle of Angus, & maister Patrike Wantoun secretarie, who for his cause had bene kept as prisoner in Insche galle. He likewise receiued the lord Hume, and his brother, pardoning them all their offenses past. And in parlement holden the first of Maie, they were restored to all their lands, heritages, fees, and honors. About that time, the lord of Straluen in Atholl committed diuerse great offenses and crimes, for the which he was taken by the earle of Atholl, and beheaded at Lograith by the gouernours commission.

All this while, the parlement was not dissolved but vpon prorogation, and so the same began againe the first day of Iulie, at what time the king of England, at request of his sister the queene of Scotland, wrote letters to the lords now assembled in parlement, requesting them to expell the gouernour forth of the realme. But all the lords and states with vniuersall consent sent Albanie the herald with letters to the said king, excusing them, that they might not in anie wise satisfie his desire therein, the same being against reason and the lawes of their countrie.

In the moneth of September, the gouernour commanded the lord Hume, with his brother maister William Hume, and David Iar of Fernihurst, to be arrested and bestowed in seuerall places, that better rule might be kept vpon the borders: but they lieng now in ward, sundrie informations were giuen vpon against them: and thereupon, the eight of October, the said lord Hume and his brother were conuict of treason, for assisting and maintaining of the theues vpon the borders, and other crimes; for the which he was beheaded: and on the morrow after, his brother the foresaid William Hume was likewise beheaded, and their heads were set vpon the Tolbuth in Edinburgh: David Iar was spared.

Alexander lord Hume left yet three brethren in life, who were all by the injuries of those times grievously afflicted with diuerse misfortunes. For George, being banished for the slaughter of a man, remained remained in England amongest his friends. John abbat of Jedburgh was banished beyond Lake. David the younger brother, which was prior of Colvingham two yeares after the death of his brethren, was (by James Hepburne, the husband of his sister) slaine by a traine, under color of a meeting and parlee, whereunto he was called; whome all men did pittie, because he was a harmlesse yong gentleman, of a singular wit, and folowie betrayed by those of whom he ought not so to have bin intrapped.

Shortlie after, the duke rode to Jedburgh with a great companie of men, & staied the great robbing & reaving which had bene used on the borders, & left there good wardens to keepe good rule in those parts, and so returned to Edinburgh. The third of November, another parliament was holden, in which it was decreed, that the gouernour should be deemed and reputed for second person of the realme, notwithstanding the claime made by his elder brother Alexander Steward, that was begotten on the daughter of the earle of Mkeneie, which was alleged to have bene first married to their father the duke of Albanie, before he was married to the earle of Bullognes daughter, on whome he begot the gouernour. Whereupon this Alexander made protestation to be heire to his father; but they were afterward agreed, and Alexander renounced his title in his brothers favor, and was made bishop of Gurrie, and abbat of Scone. At this parlement, the gouernour required licence to go into France, and to be absent there six moneths: but this sute was not granted till Aprill following.

At the same time was the earle of Lennox put in ward within the castell of Edinburgh, till he had caused the castell of Dunbryeton to be deliuered unto one Alane Steward in the constables name, & then he was set at libertie. In the moneth of December, Monsieur de la Bantie was made warden of the east marches in stead of the lord Hume, and kept daies of truce: which procured such hatred, that it cost him afterwards his life. In the moneth of Januarie, the gouernour went to saint Johns towne, and there held his seat of iustice, where the lord Fleming for the time was made great chamberlaine of Scotland, with all the fees thereof. In the yeare 1517, there came ambassadoys from Francis the new French king, to desire, that the ancient league might be renewed betwixt him and the king of Scotland, their realmes, dominions, and subiects.

For this cause, all the lords of the realme were assembled at Edinburgh, where, by them it was concluded, that the gouernour himselfe should passe the seas into France; and also that the bishop of Dunhelld, the secretarie, and the maister of Glencarne as ambassadoys should go thither: the which the thirtenth of Maie, went a shipboard, and by the east seas sailed thither, and the gouernour took ship at Petermarke beside Dunbryeton the seuenth of June, taking his course by the west seas, and so passed into France, where it was agreed, that he should haue remained but onelie foure moneths, he hauing appointed the bishops of saint Andrews and Glasgowe, the earles of Huntley, Argyle, Angus, and Arrane, to gouerne in his place, whilist he was absent. Also he ordeined Anthonie Darcie, or Monsieur de la Bantie lieutenant of the borders.

He also had caused the king to be brought into Edinburgh castell, within the which he should remaine in the keeping of the earle Marshall, the lords Erskin, Bothwell, Rithuen; of the which, two at least should be alwaies present. The queene that remained, as then in England, after the understood that the gouernour was departed towards France, returned to Edinburgh the seuententh of Iunie, but she was not suffered to see the king till August folloving: at what time, for feare of the pestilence to be crept into the castell, he was removed to Craig-miller, where the queene oftentimes came unto him; but at length, through some suspicion conceived, least the queene might conueie him away from thence into England, he was effronies brought unto the castell of Edinburgh, in which he was kept after, according to the order taken in that behalf.

¶ Much about this time in the which these things were done, John Gordon (the eldest sonne of that Alexander earle of Huntley, which for the praise of his singular godnesse obtained the surname of good) returning out of France (whither a little before he had sailed with the gouernour) was singularly welcomed and interteined of all men, who going unto his owne people (in the north parts) was taged with such grienous sicknesse that he died therewith, and by his father (to whom he should by course of nature erect the same office) shortlie after buried in the abbey of Kilrossie, with a goodlie toorne erected on him by his said father. The death of which John gave (for manie causes) manie griefes unto manie persons: but amongst other the chiefest to his father, who liued not long after his sonne. Which Alexander when he died, left the said earldome to his nephew, sonne of his sonne John; who because he was but ten yeres old, was committed to the earle of Angus, to be instructed in all godnesse of maners answering to the excellencie of that wit therewith he was indued.

This earle Huntley adorned with excellent sweetness of maners and pleasantnesse of wit, the earle of Angus would neuer or verie hardlie suffer to depart out of his companie. For which cause when the erle of Angus, for certeine suspicions of treason was banished Scotland into England, he attempted by all deuises and persuasions to intise the child to haue gone with him: but the yong boie could not be allowed with anie flatteries or persuasions to submit himselfe to the least note of reproch, in forsaking his king and countrie. Wherefore when the earle of Angus was departed into England, the child lifting up his craning hands to the king, did grant himselfe and all he had to the king and his countrie, whome the king receiued with all kind of humanitie; and prouided that he should be instructed in euerie sort of vertue and learning, that was to be desired in such a prince; because the said child was borne of his sisters mariage.

The lords and other nobles highlie offended (as well for the death of the lord Hume, as for that they saw Anthonie Darcie lord Bantie the French aduanced to greater credit than themselves, and not onelie to be made warden of the marches, but also capteine of Dunbryeton, the strongest fort of Scotland) began to raise tumults in the land. For William Cockburne (uncle of Comarck Landon) who (expelling the gardians of the papill) did keepe the castell of Landon, assisted with the helpe of David Hume lord of Woodburne (whose sister the said Cockburne had married) first began a commotion in those parts. For when they saw that all means were taken from them openlie to reuenge the same, and to set upon Bantie, they determined to performe the same (with some secret deuise) by lieng in wait for him.

For the castell of Landon or Landon, being kept in the possession of Woodburne (and such as took his part against the king) he the said Woodburne appointed subtil fellows secretlie to enter the castell, and to reteine it in the kings name. After which, this Woodburne feining a counterfeit anger (for he was a man full of all subtiltie) that this castell was so iniurionlie taken from him, and kept to the kings kings behoufe, he laid siege to the castell (as though he went about to recover the same with all the power he could) to the intent that Bantie might be intised to come thither to raise the siege. For which cause Bantie (supposing in truth that the castell had bene kept to the vse of the king) hastening the rescue thereof, came forth of the castell of Dunbar to assemble the men of the countrie to raise the siege, as lieutenant of the borders, he was chased by the said lord of Woodburne and other so fiercelie, that in the end he was slaine, and foure Frenchmen with him: his head was cut from the shoulders, and set vp in the towne of Duns [vpon the castell of Hume] the nineteenth of Januarie.

The lords regents were herewith meruelouslie offended, & chose the earle of Arrane to be warden of the borders in de la Banties place, who was also chosen to be prouost of Edinburgh: wherewith the earle of Angus was highlie displeased. But the erle of Arrane, not seeming to passe much thereof, toke George Douglas the said earle of Angus his brother, and Marke Kar, committing them to ward within the castell of Edinburgh, because of the fauor he bare vnto the said lord of Woodburne & his complices. Moreover, for due punishment of the murder of the fore said de la Bantie, there was a parliament called the nineteenth of Februarie next, in the which, David Hume lord of Woodburne, and his three brethren, William Cockbozne & John Hume, with diuerse other their partakers, were indicted for the besieging of the castell of Langton, the slaughter of monsieur de la Bantie, and for the setting vp of his head, intercommuning with the Englishmen, and diuers other misdoings.

Immediatlie after the end of this parlement, the earle of Arrane came into the Shers, with a great armie, and hauing with him the kings great artillery, ment to haue besieged such places as would haue resisted him. But at his being in Lowder, the keyes of the castell of Hume were brought vnto him, which on the next morrow he receiued, and put men within it to keepe it, as he did in Langton and Woodburne, which he receiued at the same time. The maister of Hales was also sought for at that time, that he might haue bene apprehended to answer the slaughter of David Hume, prior of Colbingham, whom he had slaine traitorously. A litle before this parlement, the bishop of Dunkeld was returned from the French king with a bond of the league renewed betwixt Scotland and France. And at that same time was one capitaine Doyres a Frenchman sent forth of France, with a certeine number of men, to receiue the castell of Dunbar into his keeping, which accordingly he did, the same being deliuered vnto him.

The earle of Lennox, who had bene with the gouernor in France, returned home into Scotland, & with him came a French herald from the king with letters, and maister Walter Steward abbat of Glenluce came likewise from the gouernor. And about that time, because the queene and lords were aduertised that the French king had contracted new bonds of peace and amitie with the king of England, without making mention of Scotland, they thought themselves euill vsed, being his confederat friends, and therupon sent sharpe letters to the king of France, and to the gouernor, by Albanie the herald. In the moneth of June, maister Gaiwen Dunbar, archdeane of saint Andrews, and cleark of the register, was preferred to the bishops see of Aberdeen that was vacant by the death of Alexander Gourdon.

This Gaiwen founded an hospitall in Aberdeen, and indowed the same with lands for sustentance of twelue poore men, with a prouost to haue care ouer them. He also builded a faire bridge, with seuen arches ouer the water of Dee beside Abberden, and purchased lands for the perpetuall vpholding thereof. He also builded two steeples in the cathedrall church, with halfe of the crosse church, and a faire palace for the small prebendaries, called the chapleins. Moreover, he bestowed manie rich & pretious ornaments vpon the same church of Abberden, as copes, chalices, and other such like things, which remained there long after. Bantie right commendable works were accomplished by this diligent prelat, greatlie to his praise and high renowne; for he spent not the fruits of his benefice in vaine, but on such maner of buildings.

The seuenteenth of June, there rose great stir in Edinburgh, by the falling out of the earle of Rothes, and the lord Lindsey, about the iniuring of the shirreffwike of Fife, by reason wherof, they were put in ward, the one in Dunbar, and the other in Dunbretton. About the beginning of August, the queene remaining in Edinburgh, vnderstood that the earle of Angus hir husband, as then sojourning in Douglas dale, had taken a faire gentlewoman in those parts, and kept hir as his concubine; for the which act she conceiued such hatred against him, that there was neuer no perfect loue betwixt them afterwards. In the beginning of Februarie, there came a cleark as ambassadoz from the French king with letters, concerning the concluding of the truce betwixt Scotland and England, which message the lords made small account of, because the king had omitted to comprehend Scotland in the league which he lastlie made with England. The seuenth of June, a mad man in Dundee que in his mad fit a ladie of inheritance, a nun, with two other women, the one of them being great with child, and also two men.

The king of England wrote letters vnto the French king, desiring him to staie the duke of Albany, that he might not come into Scotland; and furthermore, he laid ships of warre in the pase vpon the seas to watch for his comming, and to take him by the waie as he should passe. In September the king was remoued forth of the castell of Edinburgh vnto Dalkith, for donit of the pestilence, which was suspected to be in the castell of Edinburgh. And from Dalkith the erle of Arrane rode to Edinburgh to haue bin estones elected regent & prouost of that towne: but he missed his purpose, for the townesmen would not suffer him to enter, but repelled him backe, so that diuerse were hurt on both sides.

Hereupon, great dissention rose betwixt the said earle of Arrane, and the earle of Angus, because of his repulse in that sute: whereby the whole realme was diuided into partakings, so that sundrie slaughteres thereof ensued, as of the prior of Colbingham, and six of his men murdered, by the lord of Woodburne at Lamerton, the first of October. About the same time, the king returned to the castell of Edinburgh, and in the towne there were remaining at the same time the earles of Angus, Erroll, and Craib, lord; the lord Glames, and other; the bishops of saint Andrews, Abberden, Dkeneie, and Dublane, with diuerse abbats and other prelats. And in the towne of Glasgowe was the bishop of Glasgows chancelor, with the earles of Arrane, Lennox, Eglington, and Castels; the lords Rothe, Scrimpill, the abbat of Paisley, the bishop of Galloway; and other noble men of the west. Thus the lords were diuided, and would not take any order for the good government of the common-weale.

In December, monsieur de la Faict, and a French cleark called Cordell, with an English herald called Clarandine, came from the kings of France and

and England, with an ambassadoe also from the governor, with a conclusion of peace taken for one year, betwixt Scotland and England: who coming to Edinburgh, were received by the earle of Angus, and the other lords there with him, the which sent for the chancellor: the earle of Arrane to come thither; but they would not come anye nearer than to Linlithgo. The ambassadoe therefore toke in hand to perswade, that an assemble might be had in Strinelung: but the earle of Angus would not come there. Nevertheless, the said ambassadoes went thither, where the earle of Arrane and his partakers, as the chancellor and others, received them thankfully, and proclaimed the peace: according to the treatie which they had brought, and so with courteous answer and great rewards licenced them to depart. But in their returne toward England, the earle of Angus with a great number of men met them at Carlaverok, reproving them sharpelie for their demeanour, and for taking their answer of the chancellor, so that they were not a little afraid, least the earle in his displeasure would have used some outrage towards them, which otherwise than in words it should appeare he did not.

In Januarie, about the keeping of a court at Jedburgh, there was raising of people betwixt the earle of Angus on the one part, and Andrew Bar the lord of Fernhurst, in whose aid, James Hamilton came with foure hundred men: but the lord of Selsford then warden, assisting the earle of Angus his part, met Hamilton at Bello with a great company, and when they were lighted on foot, and should have foughten, the men left sir James Hamilton, the bastard of the earle of Arrane, in all the danger, with a few of his owne men about him, so that with much paine he was hoisted, and escaped in great danger unto Hume, with losse of foure of his servants which were slaine: and on the other part, there was an Englishman slaine called Kase Bar, that came in aid of the warden. On the morrow after, the lord of Fernhurst, as baliffe to the earle of Arrane, of that regaltie, held his court at the principall place of the forrest of Jedburgh, and the earle himselfe held his court likewise in an other part of the same land, three miles distant from the other.

The thirtieth day of Appill, the lord of Woodburne, and maister William Dowglafe, newlie made prior of Coldingham, with their partakers in great numbers, came to Edinburgh to aid the earle of Angus, who was within the towne against the earle of Arrane, and James Beton the chancellor, who were also there. But now by the coming of these succors, which entered by force at the weather bolme, and slue the maister of Mountgomerie, home of the earle Eglington, and sir Patrike Hamilton knight, the earle of Arrane and the chancellor, were constrained to forsake the towne, & to passe through the north loch. [To revenge this contumelie, the Hamiltons besieged the cell of Parnocke (which is the castell of Curingham) but they shortly returned backe without doing anye thing against them.]

The one and twentieth of Julie, the earle of Angus being in the towne of Edinburgh, George Hume, brother to the late lord Hume beheaded, came thither with the abbat of Coldingham, brother to the earle of Angus, and David Hume of Woodburne, and a great company of gentlemen, and others, and passed to the Tolbuth, where they remained, till the heads of the lord Hume, and of his brother William were taken downe below the place where they were fastened on a ianill, and this was done in presence of the provost for the time being. The next day they went to Linlithgo, and from thence to Perth, and so to Dundee, and thence to the cellar, and some other of that faction there. But missing of their purpose, they returned to Edinburgh againe, and causing solempne funerall obsequies to be kept in the blacke friers, for them that ought those heads, with offerings and bankets, they afterwards returned home to their owne dwellings, without attempting anye other thing for that present.

In November, the duke of Albanie arrived in Scotland on the west parts, at an haven called Craigmach, the nineteenth of the same moneth; and on the thre and twentieth he came to Edinburgh, accompanied with the quene, the archbishop of Glasgow, the earle of Huntly, and manie other lords, knights, barons, and gentlemen; and within six daies after their coming thither, the provost and bailiffes were deposed, because they had bene chosen in favour of the earle of Angus, and other appointed in their comes. Then was there a parliament summoned to be kept at Edinburgh, the six and twentieth of Januarie next following; and on the ninth of Januarie, a generall summons of foefallure was proclaimed at the market crosse in Edinburgh, where in were summoned the earle of Angus and his brother, the prior of Coldingham, the lord of Woodburne, the lord of Dalhousie, John Summerhall of Calvostrene, and William Cockburne of Langton, with their complices, to make their appearance in the said parliament to be tried for sundrie great offences by them committed.

Maister Gawin Dowglafe, bishop of Dunkeld, bearing of this proclamation, fled into England, and remained in London at the Savoy, where he departed this life, and is buried in the church there. He was a cunning cleark, and a verie good poet: he translated the twelve booke of the Aeneidos, of Virgil in Scottish meter, and compiled also The palace of honor, with diversie other treatises in the Scottish language, which are yet extant. The earle of Angus fearing the sentence of foefallure to be laied against him at the parliament, procured his wife (although there was small liking betwixt them) to labor for his pardon to the governor. Whereupon it was agreed, that the earle and his brother George Dowglafe should passe out of the realme into France, and there to remaine during the governors pleasure; and so they departed into France, and remained there all the next year following.

The king of England, hearing that the duke of Albanie was arrived in Scotland, and had taken the rule upon him, doubting lest he should perswade the Scottishmen to assist the French king against him, by persuation of the emperor he sent him to make warre, sent his heire Clarence into Scotland, to require the duke to depart from thence, alleging, that it was promised by the king of France at the last entervue betwixt them, which chanced the summer before, that he should not come into Scotland. And moreover whereas the king of England was uncle unto the king of Scots, he charged with himselfe that by nature he was bound to defend his nephew, as he was to do, and therefore he thought it not reason, that the duke being next to the crowne to succeed, if any time came, to the young king, should have the government of him, lest he might be made afoate, as other young kings had bene. He further complained, that the earle of Angus should be sent out of the realme, so that he could not enjoy the company of his wife, sister unto the said king of England.

Clarence had therefore commandment that if the duke refused to depart out of the realme of Scotland, he should intreat a defiance with him, to have againe him: which the duke of Clarence did, declaring this message by the duke's own point to point

The tenth of Aprill, there came seven great ships into the Forth, vnto Inchkeith, to haue spoiled the ships, and invade the coast there: but they were so soutlie resisted and kept off, that they were not suffered to doe anie great exploit, and so they returned

The gouernor after this (when he sawe the English overrun all the borders of Scotland) called a parlement at Edinburgh, the 9. kalends of August, to cure the same wound. Beside this, the French fearing them selues (because of a prepared and well furnished naue of the English which did euerie waie coier and keepe the sea) sent manie (and those wise and of excellent knowledge) vnto the gouernor, to request him that he should either by counsell persuade, or by authoritie enforce his Scots to take armes against the English. After which (the matter being with great consultation and manie reasons tossed in argument to and fro) it was decreed by common consent of the parlement, that a chosen number of souldiers should be prepared, to defend the borders from the invasion of the enimie; & the more strong-lie to repell the English force; it was concluded, that the children of such as were slaine in that expedition, should be freed from all charges or troubles that might light on them during their minority: and further, that the toines of all such which had anie landes (during their liues) fell in that conquest) should after the death of their husbands keepe the same for the terme of five yeres.)

The duke of Albanie, hearing of the great preparation that the earle of Shrewsburie made, to raise an armie of foure score thousand men to invade Scotland, he likewise (as it was before decreed) sent vnto all the earles, lords, and nobles of the realme, willing them to raise all such power as they could make in defense of their countrie; which they did. And so being assembled, the duke with a mightie armie of Scottishmen and certeine Frenchmen, with great artillerie, marched forward, till he came to the water of Oke ouer against Carleill: and perceiving that the English armie came not then forward, he did what he could to persuade the noble men to enter into England: but as they were in counsell together about that earrest motion made to them by the duke, a certeine graue personage said to them in this maner.

The duke of Albanie rat-feth an armie to invade England.

My lards, hither we be come by the commandement of my lard gouernor duke of Albanie, and albeit we be readie to defend our atone native realme, contrarie the invasion of our auld enimies of England, yet neuerthelesse it seemeth not good, nor for the wele of our realme of Scotland, to passe within England with our armie to invade the same at this time. And the earnest persuasions quhilk the gouernor makes to vs to doe the same, proceeds alanerlie for the pleasure of France. It appereth to be sufficient enough for vs so lang as the king our sou-reigne lord is within age to defend our alon realme, and not to invade: otherwile, we may put the haille countrie and nobilitie thereof in hazard of tinfall: for king James the fourth brought the realme of Scotland to the best that it euer was, and by the war it was brought to the worst almost that might be: for by that warre, was he and his nobilitie tinte, quhilk Scotland sore laments. Wherefore by mine advice, let vs go to the gouernor, and know of him the cause why he would persuade vs to invade England.

The words of a counsellor.

Then they all came to the gouernors tent, and the earle of Arrane, an auncient wise man spake for them all, and said: My lard gouernor, by your will and commaundement here is assembled the mass of the nobilitie of Scotland with their power, by on a pretense to enter within England. My lards here would know the cause and quarrell why this warre is begun, gif it might please your goodnesse, it should well satisfie their minds. The duke studied a little space, and said: This question would haif bin demanded yet now; for well you know, that I for-berie late I beare to the realme of Scotland (of the quhilk I haue my name, honor, and lignage) haif passed the seas from the noble realme of France, into this realme of Scotland. And great cause there was for me so to doe, to bring you to a vnitie, when ye were in diuision, by reason whereof, your realme was like to haue bin conquered and destroied.
And also the king of France, by my suites and intercession, will toine with you in aid against the English nation: and when this warre was deter-minate in the parlement, you made me captaine, authorizing me to invade England with banner displayed. There was no demand made of the cause or quarrell, and that I haif done, is by your assent and agreement, and that I will iustifie. And to answer your demand, me think you haif full cause to inuade England with fire, sword, and blood, gif ye be not forgetfull; and without you will beare dishonor and reproch for euer. For ye know that this realme of Scotland is your inheritance, as a portion of the world was of old to our nation, and annexed to our lawes and customes. When there may there be better waies, than to mainteine this our naturall inheritance: Is it not daillie sene, the great inuasions that the Englishmen on vs make, the great manlaughters and murders, with thefts and spoiles that they do daillie: Is not this one cause of warre: To defend the countrie is the office of a king, the honoz of noble men, and the verie seruite of chualtie, and the dutie naturall of the communalitie: for I thinke it a iust quarrell, gif we might conquer the realme of Englaund, and annex it to our owne realme, for the great iniuries and wrongs done by that nation to vs and our predecessozs. For sene the begining of our habitation in this Ile of Britaine, the Englishmen and we haue euer bin enemies, and vs haif they euer hated, and yet haue we euer withstand them. Suppose, we at the last battell of Floddoun field by chance lost our soueraine lard, & diuerse noble men, quihilk was rather by treason of the lard chamberlaine, than otherwise, who would not relieue the kings armie when he might. And yet I thinke we wan the field, quihilk murder all we noble men ought to reuenge. Therefore I would that you suld courageously aduance your selues in this quarrell to get honoz, and to be reuenged.

The replie of a wise counsellor.

Then one wise man that was president of the counsell, answered the gouernoz, saing: My lard, fortune of weir is led by him that all leides, and he stricks the strake, we can warke na miracles, & heare are the lards of Englaund readie to incounter vs. And gif we inuade their realme, suerlie they will fight, for their power sall increase daillie, and ours will diminish. And gif God graunt vs the victorie (as I trust he sall) yet haue we not won the field, for readie comming is the earle of Shrewesburie samikell dead in Fraunce (as ye knaw well) with an great puissant armie, and there is na doubt, but the king of Englaund will send oʒ bring another armie gif we suld chance to get the first battell. And gif we get the secound field, that will not be without great losse of manie nobles, by reason thereof, the realme shall be weaker. And gif we be ouercommen how manie suld be slaine, God knawes. They that flee are woorthie to be reputed as traitozs to the king, and so by wilfulness and fule hardinesse, the realme may be in ieopardie to be vndone. I say, while the king is within age, we aught to moue na weir, least by weir we may bring him to destruction.

The gouernozs wordes to the president's replie.

Then said the valiant gouernoz: Here is an puissant armie of Scotland, gif we returne, we sall incourage our enemies. Therefore sene you thinke it not gud to inuade, my counsell is that we campe still on the bordures, while we see what the Englishmen pretends to do against our realme. To the which the nobles consented, and laie still there in campe certeine daies after. After this conference had betwixt the nobles and the gouernoz, the quene as then being not with them, but aduertised of all the proceedings and determinations, sent word to the gouernoz, and desired him that there might be a treatie of peace had, and she promised to get the warden of the English marches to come to the gouernozs campe, vpon pledges, wherunto the gouernoz condescended. Hereupon, the lord Dacres, warden of the west marches of England [with Thomas Musgrave] came vnto the gouernozs campe, and thither also at that time was the quene hir selfe come, and so vpon the eleuenth of September, an abstinence of war was taken and couenanted, that in the meane time the duke and quene should send ambassadoz into England, to treat and conclude a resolute peace.

The lord Dacres.

In the moneth of October next ensuing, there were thre ambassadoz sent into England, according to the agreement in the last treatie, but there were so hard and extreme conditions proponed on the king of Englands behalfe, that the same could not be accepted, as being contrarie to the honoz and weale of the realme of Scotland, as the Scottishmen toke the matter. And so those ambassadoz returned without agreement oʒ conclusion of peace: thereupon followed great trouble betwixt them of the borders of both realmes. The earle of Northumberland was made warden of the whole marches, but shortly after, he began to make sute to be discharged of that office, & ceased not till he obtained it: and then was the earle of Surreie made generall warden, and the lord marquisse Dorset, warden of the east & middle marches; the lord Dacres continuing still in his office of wardenship ouer the west marches.

About the first day of March, the said lordes came to the borders, about which time, the duke of Albanie considering that the warres betwixt Scotland and England were irksome to the nobles of the realme, because the same wars were taken in hand chieflie to serue the French kings turne, therefore he passed by the west seas into France. And in the beginning of March, where he was verie hartlie and gladlie receiued of the king, his request was onlie to haue five thousand horsemen, and ten thousand footmen of Almaines, to be transported into Scotland: and doubted not, if he might haue this granted, but that with that power, and the assistance of the Scots, he should be able to ouerthrow the king of England in battell, oʒ else to driue him out of his realme. But the French king neither beleued this vaine brag, nor yet might spare anie such power, hauing warre at that time both against England, and the emperor: neuertheless, he promised him some aid, thereupon the duke abode and waited for the same a long season. In the meane while, the lordes of Scotland caused certeine noble men to lie vpon the borders moztly, in defense of the same against the Englishmen, daillie looking for support from France. Euerie companie remained their moneths, and then departed home as the custome is, and thus they continued still till September following. Much hurt was done on either part, and diuerse houses were overthrowne and destroyed both in England and Scotland.

The borders watched.

During which time, the king of France prepared certeine ships, with men, and munition, to passe with the duke of Albanie into Scotland. But the king of England, to catch him by the way, had laid a great naue of ships in the pafe on the seas, as he should make his course. But the duke imbarquing himselfe with his people at Brest in Britaine, sailed by the west parts of Scotland: and the one and twentieth day of September landed at Kirkcubize in the west part of Scotland; he brought with him (beside a good number of Frenchmen) Richard de la Poole, a man of great parentage, bozne in England, and banished his countrie. Whilest the duke was on the sea making saile toward Scotland, the earle of Surreie, with an armie of twentie thousand men, entered into Scotland, and comming to Edinburgh, burned the towne and the abbey. [But Lesleus, lib. 9. pag. 407. saith it was Jedworth which the earle burnt.] It was thought they ment to haue passed further, but the Scottishmen assembling themselves against their inuasions, they were constrained to returne with losse (as some Scottishmen haue written.)

Buchanan. lib. 14.

* In this place, Buchanan (before he cometh to the parliament assembled by the duke of Albanie after his returne out of France) writeth in this sort. We haue shewed (saith he) how miserable the state of Scotland was the last summer (through the dissention which was amongst the nobilitie) by the English (with all kind of slaughter) spoiling the places bordering nere vnto them, and besetting the the sea on euerie side, whereby we might be out of hope of all forren aid. For the deuise of the enimie tended to compell the fierce minds of the Scots (abated with such enils) to conclude a league with him; wherewith the Scots were not behind (by reason of the French faction) that by the means of the quene there might be a perpetuall truce taken betwene them. For when the lord Hume was (by death) taken away, the Dowglasse banished, and all the rest of the nobilitie rather met for companions than leaders in battels; such as had withdrawen their mind from the French, applied themselves to the quenes faction.

Whereupon the (to gratifie his brother, and to wrest all the gouernement into his owne hands) did (dissembling his greedie desire to rule) persuaade them, to deliuer their sonne (almost now past childish yeares) out of the hands of strangers, and themselves from the yoke of other mens bondage. For the quene did well foresee, that preparation and succor was made, and did come against his husband, whome before she had begun to hate extreamelie. The king of England also did commend and prefer to the Scots the counsell of his sister, by manie letters sent, and with faire promises offered; because he had none other mind, but that a perpetuall friendship might alwaies remaine betwene the adioined kingdoms; the which, as he had at other times desired; so now he mostlie wished it, not for aie commoditie to himselfe, but to the end that all men might well perceiue that he would embrace, defend, and almuich as rested within his abilitie, seeke the commoditie of his sisters sonne by all the means he might. And if the Scots would persuaade themselves to breake the league with the French, and ioine in amitie with the English; they should shortly well vnderstand, that the king of England did not seeke after soueraintie, glorie, power, or hono; but onelie studied for a concord amongst themselves, & a league betwene their nations. For which cause, he would bestow his onelie daughter Marie vpon James the king of Scotland; by which marriage, the Scots should not be subiect to the gouernement of England; but contrarie, the English vnder the rule of the Scots. For by that means, besides the quenching of great hatred betwene the nations (and intercourse of merchandize, exchange of mutuall courtesies and ioinings in affinitie) there should be an indissoluble knot made for the hono; of the whole Island.

And with this, they (for England) remembred the profit and disadvantage that might rise to the one from other, by the friendship or hatred of either kingdom, and the benefit that they might looke for from their English neighbours, more than by aie possibilitie they might obtaine from their French confederats. For on the one side, the English and they were borne in one continent, brought vp vnder the same influence of the heauen, and so like in all things, in tong, in maners, in lawes, in decrees, in countenance, in color, and in lineaments of bodie, as that they rather seeme one than two nations. On the other side, the French are not onelie different from them, by naturall soile and clemencie of the heauens; but more seuered from them in order and forme of living, being further such a people, as if they were enimies vnto them, they could not greatlie hurt them; and if they be their friends they can not greatlie helpe them. But the English are at hand with men, munition, and monie; when the French, being so far off, are onelie with allurements, inforcements, and for their owne commoditie drawen to take their part. Besides which, there can be no succor from France but by sea, which the enimie may easilie stop; and so the Scots not able to be succored by them. But from the English they may haue aid by land with speed, and no man can hinder them thereof. Wherefore they should consider how discommodious (for the dispatch of their affairs) and how vnapt (for the defense of themselves) it should be, to hang all the hope of their succor vpon the fauor of the wind; and to place the most suertie of their estate in the vnconstant friendship of the vn-certaine elements. For (if neuer before) yet at this time the Scots might not onlie perceiue in thought but see in deed that helpe is to be hoped (in present dangers) from absent friends, when that the English can not onelie helpe you now, but at this instant do also keepe away your promised and long expected aid, which they haue so besieged vpon the sea, that you can receiue no benefit or helpe from them.

After that these things were thus laid abroad for the knitting of the English league, as there were not a few which gaue consent to that motion, so were there manie that stidie argued to the contrarie. For in that assemblie, there were manie pensioners of the French faction, who (increasing their priuat commoditie by the publike detriment) did vtterlie abhor from all peace; besides whome, there were also some, which suspected the facilitie of promise in the English: especiallie, since the whole estate of England did then chiefele hang vpon the backe of Thomas Wolseie the cardinall, an euill and ambitious person, and who referred all counsels and consultations to the amplifying of his owne priuat authoritie and dignitie; and for that cause, applied that and all other things to euerie blast of fortune. All our men although they were moued by diuerse reasons (as the varietie of diuerse witte byed diuerse minds) did yet with like endeuor tend vnto one end, which was alwaies to defend the French league; for they denied, that the same sudden liberalitie of the enimie, could aie way sozt to their benefit; since this was not the first time that the English had used that policie to intrap vntuarie men: as did Edward the first, who (swearing and binding himselfe with all bonds of law, when he was chosen an arbitrator to cease the strife of the kingdom of Scotland) did with great iniurie make a king of Scots at his pleasure: and of late also, Edward the fourth king of England (when he had promised his daughter Cecillie to the sonne of James the third) did (the maid being readie for the marriage) dissolve the same, by taking occasion of warre through our ciuill dissensions. According to which, the English do now also seeke none other matter, than (casting a vaine hope before vs to gouerne them, to bring vs into right seruitude; and (when we are destitute of all forren helpe) to oppresse vs with all the power of their kingdom.

Neither is that true also (wherein the chiefe strength of their speech consisteth) that the aid of our neighbors naere at hand, is better or surer to vs than further friendship. For how may we looke for aie good from those our neighbors, since commonlie amongst neighbors there neuer want occasions of dissention; which oftentimes chance byingeth forth, and the stronger (having small or no occasion) will manie times seeke to offer: at what time, he which is greatest in armes, must & will appoint lawes of agreement as seemes best to his liking. Beside, there was neuer yet so sacred or firme a bond of amitie betwene adioining kingdoms, which was not oftentimes broken, either by offered or sought occasions of displeasure & breach: neither is it to be hoped, that the English will abstaine from offering violence vnto vs; that haue not spared the blood of so manie of their owne kings. For the sanctitie of leagues, & the religion of an oth, and the faith of compacts and covenants, are in truth firme bonds of amitie amongst the good: but amongst the wicked, they are nets to intrap others, if occasion of commoditie be offered for breach of them. All which benefits and iururies, doe dwell in people, whome nerenesse of bounds, conuersation of language, and not unlike maner of life hath ioined together.

And if all these things should be far otherwise, yet there be two things which we ought speciallie to foresee and prouide for; whereof, the one is, that we spend not our time in vaine by chiding and disagreement, as persons drawn into diuerse factions; the other, that we reiect not our old friends (for this new alliance) before we haue heard what they can say; especiallie in such a cause (as this) which may not be determined, but by the content of the parliament. Upon which, the French followers did earnestlie stand; that there should not anie thing be done therein; and therefore sent certeine of the French aid as ambassadoers about the cause. This thus ended, and the comming of the gouernour spread abroad, the same made manie glad, confirmed the doubtfull thereof, and withdrew others (that were inclined to the English part) from the same opinion they were of.]

The duke immediatlie after his arriuall came to Edinburgh, where he caused all the lords of the realme to assemble in that towne, where he declared the great loue and affection that the king of France bare to the realme of Scotland, inso much as hearing of the slaughters, murders and burnings, practised by the Englishmen, he thought that he felt the same done vnto him, reputing himselfe one of their members. And for reuenging thereof, he would be partner with them as their member: for more credit whereof, he shewed the kings letter, confirming his declaration. He therefore exhorted them to assemble an armie, in reuenge of iniuries & wrongs done to them and their countrie; for he had brought with him monie, men, and artillerie to the furtherance thereof. Hereupon it was concluded, that the armie should assemble at Dowglas dale the eighteenth of October: the which conclusion they kept, and from thence they marched to Caldreame vpon Tweed, and sent ouer the water certeine of their great artillerie, with a companie of Frenchmen and Scots, by the guiding of David Car; and being got ouer, they lay siege to the castell of Marke, which was kept by sir William Lisle capitaine thereof, hauing with him a strong garrison of English souldiers, and great prouision of artillerie, and all things necessarie: yet at the first assault, the vtter barnekin was woone, and the said companie of Scottishmen and Frenchmen lay within the same, indamaging the castell in all they might.

The earle of Surrie and diuerse others of the English nobilitie, with an armie of fortie thousand men, were at Antwike, not far distant from Marke, and the marquesse Dorset was sent with a great companie to keepe the towne of Berwike, for doubt least the same should haue bene besieged. Also in the meane time, a new assault was made to the inner barnekin of Marke; and the same woone likewise as the other had bene before. After this was the castell assailed, and part of it beaten downe with the artillerie lieng on the Scottish side of the water of Tweed. At which breach, the assault was giuen, and the same continued, till that through darknesse and lacke of light, the assailants were driuen to retire. Great slaughter was made at that assault on both sides, but especiallie of them within the house. The assailants went to haue giuen a fresh assault the next day, being the fourth of Nouember: but a soze and vehement storme and tempest of raine chanced that night, so that they were constrained to leaue off that enterprise, and to get themselves ouer the river againe vnto the armie, least by the rising of the water of Tweed, they might haue bene cut off by their enemies, before they could haue bene succoured.

In the meane time, whilst this siege continued, a number of Scottishmen made a road into the countrie of Glendale within the English marches, and burnt and spoiled diuerse townes, cast downe sundrie piles, and returned without anie resistance: for the earle of Surrie would suffer none of his people to depart from the armie, nor breake order, for feare of more inconuenience. The duke of Albanie lieng on the Scottish side of Tweed, sent an herald vnto the earle of Surrie, willing him to call to remembrance, how in his absence he had inuaded Scotland with fire and sword: for the which cruell dealing, he required him vpon his honoz to come forward, and he would meet him in the confines of both the realmes, and giue him battell. To the which message the earle answered, that he had no commission to inuade Scotland at that time, but it onlie to defend. And (as some haue reported) he caused a secret messenger to passe to the quene, as then lieng a good way distant from the armie, to moue for some abstinence and truce, and further to persuaade the duke to retire home; which he did, so that by his labor, a truce was taken for that instant, and afterward confirmed for a longer time: and thus the duke returned with honoz (as the Scottishmen report.) This truce was well kept all the next winter following, and no inuasion made, till the moneth of Maie: and then was the erle of Surrie sent againe to the English borders, and the lords of Scotland on the other part monethlie laie on their borders by quarters, for defense of their countrie, as the vse is.

On Trinitie sondaie, being the one and twentieth of Maie, five hundred Scots entered England, to surprize the English merchants, and others, going that day vnto Berwike, where pærelle on that day the faire is kept; and so by reason thereof, they met with diuerse of them that went to this faire, and toke to the number of two hundred prisoners, whom they led with them into Scotland. But Hall saith, that by the comming of the young lord of Fulberie to the succors of the Englishmen, the Scots were chased, and lost two hundred of their numbers. On the fift of Iulie, sir William Fentwike, Leonard Pulgrau, & Bassard Heron, with diuers other, to the number of nine hundred Englishmen, entered into the Wers, and began to spoile and rob the countrie: but they were shortly compassed about with Scottishmen, & so hardlie assailed, that although they fought valiantlie a good while, yet by fine force they were compelled to giue ground, and seeke to saue themselves by flight, in which two hundred of them were taken prisoners, and Bassard Heron with diuerse other slaine. Amongest the prisoners, were sir Rafe Fentwike, Leonard Pulgrau, and diuers other gentlemen of good calling.

On the seventeenth of Iulie, the lord Marwell, and sir Alexander Fordein, with diuerse other Scottishmen in great numbers, entered England at the west marches by Caerleill, with displayed banners, and began to harrie the countrie, and burne diuers places. The Englishmen assembled on euerie side, so that they were farre more in number than the Scottishmen, and thereupon set fiercelie vpon their enemies, inso much that for the space of an houre, there was a soze fight continued betwixt them. But the lord Marwell like a right politicke capitaine (as of all that knew him he was no lesse reputed) ceased not to incourage his people: & after that, by the taking of

After this iourneie, there was an assemblie of the lordes in Edinburgh, with the duke of Albanie, where some of the lordes were of mind that the warre should continue: other thought it not reason, that for the pleasure onelie of France, the realme should suffer such damage, as it had done by those thre last yeres wars now passed, and therefore they persuaded peace. Moreover, there was also much debating of the matter, touching the age and gouernement of the king; some of the lordes holding that he was now of age to take the rule vpon himselfe, and that the guardianship or tutorie of a king expired sooner than of another private person. The duke of Albanie perceiving how the lordes were diuided amongst themselves, and neither content with his gouernement, nor willing to mainteine the warres which he had so earnestlie perswaded for the pleasure of France, he declared to them that he wold returne into France, and so taking his leaue of the nobilitie, went to Striueling where the king was, of whome he toke leaue, also giuing vnto him such louing and faithfull counsell, as to his knowledge seemed expedient, and so went into the west countrie, where he toke the seas in September, and sailed forth into France, [neuer to returne into Scotland.]

The king of England [before the rumoz of the departure of the duke of Albanie] hauing in the moneth of June sent ouer into France, vnto Archembald earle of Angus, that remained there vpon the commandement of the duke of Albanie, perswaded him to come from thence secretlie into England, which accordingly he did; and being safelie arrived in England, king Henrie procured him to passe into Scotland, that with the assistance of such lordes as would be readie to take his part, he might raise war against the duke of Albanie, which sought by all means (as the king of England was informed) to destroy him & his: but per the earle could come into Scotland, the duke was departed toward France. On the six and twentieth of Iulie, the king by the aduise of his mother, and certeine yong lordes, came from Striueling vnto Edinburgh; and thre daies after, the quene toke the whole gouernment of the king vpon hir, and entered into the castell of Edinburgh with the king, where they sojourned the most part of the next winter. The prouost of Edinburgh was discharged, whom the towne had chosen, and the lord Marwell was appointed by the quene, prouost in his place. For the performance wherof, there was a parlement also summoned to be holden at Edinburgh the third day of Februarie next ensuing [and the bishop of saint Andrews and Aberdeen (as saith Buchanan li. 14.) were cast into prison, who after gathering armes (and cursing all others) within the space of a moneth following were reconciled to the king.]

The king of England glad to heare that the duke of Albanie was departed into France, sent into Scotland in ambassage one maister John Wagnus, and Roger Katcliffe esquier, to declare vnto the quene and lordes, that he would be content that a truce might be accorded betwixt the two realmes of England and Scotland, now that the duke of Albanie was returned into France, who had bene the onlie procurer of the warres. Whereupon they agreed to take truce to indure for one yere, and in the meane time they appointed to send ambassadors into England to treat vpon a continuall peace, all-ance, and amitie to be had betwixt both the realmes. In this meane while, the earle of Angus came into Scotland: and because of the displeasure which the quene bare him, there ensued occasions of great diuisions within the realme. Notwithstanding the quene by aduise of certeine lordes, sent the lord Gilbert earle of Cassels, Robert Cockeboz, the bishop of Dunkeld, and doctor Wille abbat of Cambuskenneth, ambassadors into England, in the moneth of December; the which were receiued at Greenwich by the king of England the foure and twentieth of the same moneth: where the bishop of Dunkeld made an eloquent oration in Latine, declaring the cause of their coming, the which in effect was for intreatment of peace, loue, and amitie betwixt the two realmes: and for the more sure establisment thereof, they required that a marriage might be concluded betwixt their king & the ladie Marie, daughter to the king of England.

Edinburgh.

The parties are agreed.

Councillors
appointed.

This request was well heard by the king, who thereupon appointed commissioners to common thereof with the said ambassadors. Diuerse articles were proponed by the said commissioners on the king of England his behalfe, and in especiall one; which was, that the king of Scotland should renounce the league with the king of France; and that further he should come into England, and remaine there till he came to perfect age to be married. Because the ambassadors had not commission to conclude so farre, the earle of Cassels returned into Scotland, to vnderstand the minds of the lordes and counsell in these points, the other remaining at London till his returne to them againe. * Upon All saints day there was a great motion of wind, with such stormes and tempests of thunder and lightning which suddenlie arose, that the same (ouerthrowing manie priuat houses in Edinburgh, and the pinnacle of the tower of David in the same castell) entered into the quenes lodging with a great flame, which burnt so vehementlie, and went so farre, that it had almost consumed the same; which storme (ouerthrowing the buildings about the chamber of the bishop of Whitchurch) the bishops lodging did yet remaine safe not touched with the violence of the flame.)

When the day of the parlement appointed to be holden in the Tolbuth of Edinburgh was come, the king, quene, and lordes, fearing some tumult in the towne to be raised by the earle of Angus, would not passe forth of the castell, but kept the parlement within the same. Archembald Dologlasse earle of Angus, and John Stewart earle of Lennox, with diuerse others, to the number of two thousand men, came in the night season vnto Edinburgh, because they durst not enter the towne in the day time, for feare of the gunnes that late in the castell. The next day, being the fourteenth day of Februarie, the said earles with the archbishop of saint Andrews, the bishop of Aberdeen, that by the quenes appointment had bene kept before in ward, the bishop of Dunblane, Calene Campbell, the earle of Argyle, and diuerse other lordes and barons being in the towne, sent to the castell, alledging that the king was kept as prisoner by the quene, and iustice suppressed, with great damage of the common wealch; and therefore he desired, that the king might be deliuered vnto them, to be gouerned by the aduise of the thre states, and if they refused to deliuer him, they would besiege the castell, and if they won it, all their lines within should rest at their pleasures, the kings onelie excepted.

request.

The quene, by the counsell of the earles of Ardrane and Murray, refused not onelie to deliuer the king, but sent them word, that except they did depart the towne, they would merlie discharge all the artillerie artillerie of the castell against them. Hereupon, great feare rose in the towne, speciallie among the burgeses, but by the diligence of certeine persons that trauelled betwene the parties, an assurance was taken on either side for certeine daies. In the meane time, the earle of Angus caused the castell to be forsaken, that neither meat nor other thing might be suffered to be conueied into it, except so much as might serue for the sustentation of the king's owne person. At length, all the parties were agreed, so that the fourth and twentieth day of February, the king came into the parliament holden in the Colthulph in most honorable wise, with the assistance of all the estates, having the erowne scepter, and sword borne before him, and from thence he was brought to the abbey where he remained.

In this parliament, there were eight lords chosen to be of the king's privie counsell, the which took the government of the king and realme upon them, as these: the archbishops of saint Andrews and Glascow, the bishops of Aberdeen and Dunblane: the earles of Angus, Argyle, Arrane, and Lennor: the quene was aduised to be in her principall, without whose aduise nothing should be done. From this parliament also was the earle of Cassels sent, with answer to the king of England; who came to London the nineteenth of March. But because the king had knowledge that the French king was taken at the battell of Pavia, he would not proceed in the treatie of marriage betwixt the king of Scotland and his daughter, till he had the emperors aduise, whome he affirmed to be his confederat friend: and so renewing the truce for three yeers and six moneths, the ambassadois returned into Scotland about the beginning of April next ensuing, without anie contract of marriage at that time. The agreement betwixt the quene and lords continued not long, for anon after died the bishop of Dunblane or Dunkeld (as saith Lesleus) whose benefice the earle of Angus obtained of the king for his brother William Dowglas, without the aduise of the quene and other lords. Whereupon the quene departed and went into Striueling, leaving the king with the earle of Angus, who took the whole rule and government of the realme and king vpon him, and made his vnckle Archembald Dowglas treasurer of the realme, and bestowed benefices, offices, and all other things, by the aduise of his brother George Dowglas, and the earle of Lennor, who assisted him.

In this meane time, the archbishop of saint Andrews, and the earles of Arrane, Argyle, and Murray, remaining with the quene at Striueling, alleged that the king was withholden from them by the earle of Angus force against his will: and therefore they sent vnto the earle, requiring him to deliuer him. But the earle caused the king to giue the answer himselfe, that he would not come from the earle of Angus, albeit he would gladlie haue bene out of his hands if he might; as by secret messages sent to sundrie of the lords, and likewise at that time it appeared, for he willed them by priuie meanes to assemble an armie, and to come & fetch him out of their hands that thus detained him. Hereupon shortly after, they raised a power, and coming therewith to Linlithgow, purposing to passe into Edinburgh, that they might get the king out of the earle of Angus his hands: the said earle, with the earle of Lennor and other his assistants being thereof aduertised, came to the field with the kings banner displayed, and brought the king with him, although partly against his will.

The quene and such lords as were with her there in the armie, for the reuerence they bare vnto the kings person, and also fearing the danger that might chance to them if they buckled together in a fough ten field, they withholden themselves to Striueling, and from thence the quene went into Murray land with the earle of Murray, and there remained a long time after. The earles of Arrane and Argyle went into the west countrie, and the bishop of saint Andrews to Dunfermling: and then the earle of Angus took vpon him more boldlie the government of the king and realme, and sent to the bishop of saint Andrews (who was chancelor) for the great seale, which was deliuered to them that were so sent for it. The nobles of the realme remaining thus at variance, and diuided among themselves, there was small obedience of lawes & iustice. Diuerse slaughters in sundrie parts were committed, great thefts & robberies made by the borderers vpon the inland countries. Moreover, aduise this yeere (as some haue said) was sued before the archbishop of saint Andrews, betwixt the quene, and the earle of Angus his husband, and then afterwards she took to her selfe one Henrie Stewart, sonne to the lord of Arundale, the which Henrie was after created by the king lord of Methuen.

On the foure and twentieth of Iulie, the king being accompanied with the earle of Angus, the lord Hume, the barres & others, rode vnto Jedburgh, in purpose to haue reformed the misgovernance of the borderers; but after that they had remained there three daies with little obedience shewed towards them, they all returned. And vpon the 29 day of Iulie, at the bridge of Melrose, the lord of Wocclough, accompanied with a thousand horsemen, began to shew himselfe in sight, whose principall purpose was to haue taken the king from the earle of Angus and his assistants, being requested and commanded by the king himselfe so to do. The earle of Angus incontinentlie sent an herald vnto the lord of Wocclough, to know what his intention was to do; who answered, that he came to do the king honor and seruice, and to shew his friends and power as the wis of the borderers.

The earle of Angus, with the lord Hume, and the rest, not being content with this answer, because of the great feud betwixt him and the Humes, and the barres, sent vnto him a commandement in the kings name to depart, and not to approach nere to the kings presence, vnder paine of high treason. Wherevnto he answered, that he knew the kings mind well enough & would not spare for this commandement to come to his graces presence. Which answer receiued from him, incontinentlie the earle of Angus, the lords Fleming and Hume, the barres, the lord of Sesselford, with their friends, alighted on foot; the king remaining on horsebacke, accompanied with the earle of Lennor, the lord Marbell, George Dowglas, and Pinian Cretchton, tutor of Sainquhar.

The lord of Wocclough lighted also on foot, but because the most part of his men were of the theues and outlawes of the borders, commonlie called broken men, vpon their first comming to joining with their speares, they fled, leaving the lord of Wocclough with a small number of his owne seruants about him in all the danger: yet they defended themselves verie manfullie, and slue the lord of Sesselford and diuerse other, on the earle of Angus his side: but finally, oppressed with multitude, they were put to flight, and foure score of Woccloughes men slaine in the chase. After this, the king returned to Jedburgh, and remained there the space of foure daies, and then returned to Edinburgh.

All this while, the king was gouerned and holden against his will, by the earle of Angus and his assistants, although he did not outwardlie shew so in countenance, but dissembled the matter as well as he might, might, yet perceiuing two enterprises to haue qualled that had bene attempted for his deliuerance, he thought to assaie the third; and hereupon, procured the earle of Lennor to assemble an armie, with assistance of the quene and his friends, to helpe to deli-uer him from the hands of his enemies. The earle of Lennor did so, and came with such power as he could raise from the west parts unto Linlithgo. The earle of Angus being aduertised, that the earle of Lennor was gathering men, sent to the earle of Ar-rane for aid, requiring him to come with such power as he could make, and to meet him at Linlithgo. The earle of Arrane immediatlie herewith gathered a power, and with the same came to Linlithgo before the earle of Lennor came thither, who hostlie after comming with his people, approached that towne, but to whom the earle of Arrane sent a messenger, requiring him to stande and saue his enterprise, assuring him, that albeit he was his sisters sone, he would not spare him, if he held fast upon his fourtie. The earle of Lennor herewith answered in a great rage, that he would not fraie, till he came to Edenburgh, or else die for it by the waie. The earle of Arrane therfore nor staing for the earle of Angus, his coming from Edenburgh, issued forth of Linlithgo at the west end of the towne, and incountered the earle of Lennor and his companie, where there was a cruel onset given on both sides, but subdenlie the earle of Lennor his companie fled, and he himselfe with the lord of Hunsford and diuerse other gentlemen were slaine.

The death of which Dowlglas the king did great lament, and hearing the clamor and noise that was made in that conflict, did send forth (but all too late) Andrew Wood (his familiar) to haue succored the Lennor, if by any meanes he could. After this victorie, the faction of the Dowlglases (to the end that striking a feare in those that were enuious against them, they might make them alwaies to be in danger to them) began to moue questions and sutes in law, against such as had borne armor against the king: for feare whereof some bought their peace with monie, some toke part with the Dowl-glases, some followed the Hamiltons, and some stidie standing in the matter, were followed and called into the law. Of which number Gilbert earle of Castles (when he was earnestlie pressed by James Hamilton the bassard, to yeld himselfe to the part of the Hamiltons) being a man of great stomach, gaue this answer, that the old league of friendship, which was betwene their grandfathers (in which his grandfather was alwaies the more honorable and first named) should not make him now so forgetfull of the honor of his familie, that he would seme to degenerat from his ancestors, and willinglie grant to be under defense (which is the next degree of seruitude) of them, whose head in making an equall league and couenant was contented with the second place of honor.

Wherefore, when the said Gilbert appeared in the law at the day appointed, for the deciding of his cause: Hugh Kennedie his kinsman answered for him, that he was present in that battell, as sent thirther by the king, and not as enemie to the king, and he would (if need required) bring forth the kings letters therfore, notwithstanding the Hamiltons fro-ning and fretting against his boldnesse: for the king had written as well to Gilbert (going home) as to manie others, to ioin with John Steward earle of Lennor, who seeing the battell at hand, and that he had not time left to call together his friends and followers, did with his present companie (taking his fourtie out of the waie) turne to Strimeling. Wherefore (the power of the Hamiltons in that cause somewhat supposed) James Hamilton the bassard stirred with great hatred against Kennedie, did procure Hugh Campbell thirle of Aire to dispatch him out of the waie, which he hostlie after did in his returne home. Afterward this Hugh, in the end he might dissemble his conscience, or knowledge of this euill (the execution wherof he had committed to his fellows) was remaining at the day and time of the same murder, with John Arskine, whose sister was the wife of Gilbert Kennedie.

What he (as some as the heard of that deed) did with manie bitter words, lay the fault unto him, because by thating the noble house of the Kennedies, had almost bene thought to, utter destruction, had he not less a yong sonne behind him. This yong earle, after the death of his father, and to his kinsman Archibald Dowlglas, then the kings treasurer, to whome he committed the defense of himselfe and his familie. This done, Hugh Campbell was called into law for the same, who being manifestlie conuicted thereof, was banished into an other place. After this the Dowlglases with lesse bitternesse, excise their anger against James Watson, for bringing their power to saint Andrews, which they spoiled, as after appeareth.

In the meane time, the earle of Angus bringing the king with him, arrived, and had come to the battell, but that the king was not willing to come forth of Edenburgh in that quarrell (as some haue written) and therefore made excuses, as he did also by the waie, taking himselfe sicke: but George Dowlglas droue and called upon his horse berie charpelle, and constrained him to ride forth with faster pace than he would haue done, giuing him manie iniurious words, which he remembered afterwards, and would not forget them. They went that night to Strime-ling, and hostlie after passed through it, searching for the quene, and the bishop of saint Andrews, and because they were kept secretlie in their friends houses, so that they could not be heard of, they spoiled the abbete of Dunfermling, and the castell of saint Andrewes, taking awaie all the meueables which the archbishop had within the same.

In the north parts also, the two families of the Lelles and the Forboises, intangled with mutuall hatred, raised great flames of tumults and parts taking: which enimities did after grow to be the greater, because there were daily manie slaughters of the nobles & other people committed in Spar, Car-roth, and Aberden, whilste ech faction labored to de-send it selfe against the others. For which cause (when the common-wealth was much deformed thereby, and all iustice seemed almost vicerlie ouerthrowne in those parts) the earle of Angus and other of the nobilitie (which were of the kings priue counsell) did not cease, untill they had made vnitie betwene those two families. But in the end (the heire of the For-boises, & the lord Lenthurke, hauing by wait killed the noble baron Speldurme, which fauored the Lelles) those buried contentions began againe to be raised from the dead; whose enimities being once againe knowne to the nobilitie (and what hurt might insue thereof to the common state) they attempted all possible means once more to quench that deadly flame, and afresh to ioin their minds together in amitie, with this prouiso, that the murderers of Speldurme should (for punishment of their offense) be banished into France, where the greatest part of them died, after manie miseries and reproches sustained in their pitifull life. Which last league so sincerlie vnitied be-twene the Forboises and the Lelles, was embraced with such faith ech to other, by renewing thereof with continuall marriages & other courtesies, that it continueth most firme euen unto this day.

In

In which north parts also, the inhabitants (partlie following their naturall disposition, and partlie excited by the example of the former times long suffered to be used) did in like sort overrun and spoile all things, by reason of ouermuch libertie. But of all other stirs raised in those parts, that was the greatest and most troublesome, which was raised by the Spakintolches. Of which brutish people, the one familie was called the Glencathens, and the other was surnamed Spakintolches after the head of that kindred; in which, the chiefe was called Lachlane Spakintolche a man of great possessions, and of such excellencie in singolaritie of wisdom, that with great commendation he did containe all his followers within the limits of their duties, more than others did. Which contentments (when they could hardly beare (as loth to live in order) having so long passed their time licentiouslie) did withdraw the hearts of manie men from him. Amongest whome was James Spalcolmeson his kinsman (who thirsting after the desire to rule) took occasion (by the insurie of the time) traitorouslie with deceit to kill this Spakintolche; after which (fearing further trouble to insue towards him) he flieth to the Isle (at the lake Rothmurcolle) as a sanctuary or defense for him. But the rest of the familie of the Spakintolches did pursue him with such eager minds, that by force taking him in the Isle; they worthilie killed him, and manie of his confederats, guiltie of that wickednesse. After which (because the sonne of Spakintolche, for his tender yeares, was not sufficient with feare & punishment to brydle the minds of his fierce subiects) by common consent they chose the bastard brother of the slaine man (called Hector Spakintolche) to be head and leader of that familie, untill this young nephew might grow to yeeres, and might weeld the governement of his owne tribe.

Now when the earle of Arrreie perceived that if the sonne of Spakintolche were committed to the rashnesse of a people somewhat fierce and cruell, that he should (on euerie side) be oppressed with manie troubles; he did most goodlie (for the care he had of him his nephew being his sisters sonne) provide, that he should be caried to an other place, to the Dgilluies, the childs kin on the mothers side, where he should be well instructed and imbued with the precepts of all learning and vertue. Whereat Hector was greatly offended, to see that the child should so subtilie be taken from him. Wherefore (affirming that much of his authoritie was thereby diminished) he attempted (euerie way he might) to get the child againe into his possession, that thereby he might salve and recover his credit and authoritie. But some there were, which supposed that the great care and labor which he so much employed (for getting the child into his hands) was to none other intent, but that he might make him atwaie, and prepare a path whereby to lead his owne sonne to the governement of that familie. Which conceipt being deeplie graven in the mind of the earle of Arrreie, caused him to seeke the preservation of the child, that by no means he might fall into the hands of Hector.

Wherewith Hector being highlie incensed (and determining to spue out his choler, seeking reuenge by anie kind of means) he did cause his brother William & other of his kindred, that joining their force, they might stronglie ver the earle of Arrreie, and spoile his possessions: which they did with so great furie, that ouerthrowing the fort of Dikes; and besieging the castell of Coinewaie, they executed manie cruelties, slaughters, spoiles, burnings, and other mischietes vpon all sorts of people, men, women, and childzen, and all such as fauored them. For their hatred not limited against the earle of Arrreie, extended further against the familie of the Dgilluies, amongst whom the child was left in custodie for education cause. With which mind this Hector and his complices placing their campe at the castell of Hettens, which belonged to the lord of Durnens (one of the familie of the Dgilluies) they did so furiously besiege the same, as the people of the same were in the end forced to yield the fort: which when they had entred, they killed foure and twentie of the Dgilluies, whom they found therein. After vpon (their minds being now aduanced with spoiles and happie successes) they became so proud, as (trusting ouermuch to prosperous euent in all their actions) they neuer set end to their wicked crueltie, untill the erle of Arrreie did with force execute iust iudgement vpon them. For when the earle beheld them immoderatlie reioicing, in spoiling his lands, and committing other excessive evils; he obtained of the king and his counsell, that he might be made the kings deputie and gouernor in that battell, to brydle the rage and boldnesse of those in that order spoiling the common-wealth.

Wherefore the earle assembling an armie, did with such speedie valure come vpon them and their countrie, that at the first he took almost two hundred of their captiues, and committed them to the gallowes. All whose faith was so true to their captiue, as (when life was seuerallie promised to euerie one man as he was alone lead to the gallowes) there would not anie one of them confesse where their captiue Hector had hidden himselfe. For euerie one answered (with bold spirit) that they knew not where he was become; and if so be they did, that yet they would not (by anie paine or terrore of death) be induced to breake their faith and to betraye their maister. But hanging not being thought a sufficient reuenge (for such captiues as the earle had taken) there were more grauous punishments laid vpon William Spakintolche (brother to Hector) because in the beginning he nourished those coles of choler for his brothers cause. For after that this William was hanged, his head was chopped off and fastened vpon a pole at Dikes, and the other foure parts of his bodie were sent to the towne of Elgin, Foressie, Inuernesse, and Alberne, there to be set by publikelie to the reproch of them, and the example of others.

Now, after all these stirs, Hector (seeing his men were thus dispersed and executed, and that himselfe was excluded from anie other succor) fled to the faithfull helpe of Alexander Dunbar deane of Arrreie, by whose aduise he goeth humbly and secretlie to the king, beseeching his mercie and fauor to be extended vnto him: for he supposed it better, rather to craue the doubtfull mercie of his lord, than to make triall of the earle of *Arrreie*s certaine reuenge. Wherevpon the king (seeing his humble submission) receiued him into his fauor; and did with all his heart louinglie after embrace him, because he was valiant and wise in warre, and in counsell. But God, whose iustice is alwaies shewed in punishing of wickednesse, would not suffer this filthinesse of crueltie, theft, murder, & spoile (where with Hector did wickedlie defile his life) to go unreuenged with most grauous paine vpon the said Hector. For in the citie of Saint Andrews, sudden death (than which there can be no greater punishment) was laid vpon him by one James Spente a priest, who was himselfe afterwards beheaded. When the earle of Arrreie had shewed such reuenge vpon the friends of Hector and their companions; the people of the province of Glencathen did from thenceforth keepe themselves within the limits of their dutie: untill that the sonne of Lachlane lane Makintosh came to man's estate and full age. Which young man was in his first yeares imbued with such learnings and pollicie of life conformed thereunto, that when he was impleid about the common-wealth, all the capitans of them (who that rallie speake Irish in the furthest part of Scotland) did embrace him as a perfect paterne of all vertue, and an excellent workemaister to frame a well ordered state. Wherefore certene (not able to fullaine the brightnesse of his vertue) did ioine in counsell with such as were nearest of blood unto him, and had before laid violent hands on his father, to take his life away by forceable means. Whereof we shall more liberallie intreat in an other place.

This yeare the king by counsell of the earle of Angus, Arrane, and others, went with eight thousand men unto Jedburgh, to set some order amongst the borderers, for the keeping of better rule: and soon the eight of June, the principals of all the surnames of the clans on the borders, came to the king, binding themselves, and deliuering pledges for their good demerors. The seuententh of Iulie, there was a great assemblie of the lords at Holie rood house, at that time, there came a simple fellow (to looke upon) seruant and hozskeper sometime to the earle of Lennox, who in the midst of a great companie of people in the abbete close, strake sir James Hamilton knight verie desperatlie with a short prage or dagger in the bellie three seuerall stripes vp to the hait, and yet the said sir James died not of those hurts.

The man being taken, by & by confessed the deed without repentance, saieing; Why on the feoble hand quike wald not do that thing the heart thought, and was determinat to do. And being inquired what he was, and who caused him to do the same; he answered that he was a seruant of God, sent by him to do that deed. And albeit he was put to great torture and paines daillie by the space of a moneth, yet would he neuer giue other answer, and so he was hanged, and his head set ouer one of the gates of Edenburgh towne. About the same time, there came out of Germanie maister Patrike Hamilton, abbat of Freyne, brothers sonne to the earle of Arrane, who had bene scholer to Martin Luther, & others there. This man being conuented and examined vpon certene articles, as of iustificacion, predestination, of free will, and such like, contrarie to the doctrine taught by the church in that time, because he did as firme, and constantlie defend them, he was declared an heretike and burned.

The eighteenth of March, the king besieged the castell of Edenburgh, the queene and hir husband Henrie Steward, with James his brother being within it. But as soone as the queene understood, that hir sonne the king was there in person, she caused the gates to be set open, and vpon hir knees besought him of grace for hir husband and his brother; and would not rest, till she had obteneid the same; but yet they were kept in ward within the castell, till the king afterwards released them. In the yeare following, the king being now come to the age of seuentene yeares, and of god discretion and wit for his time, would not longer remaine vnder the gouernement of the earle of Angus and his companie. Therevpon he assembled diuerse noble men of Striueling, & by their counsell sent an herald vnto the earle of Angus & his assistants resident as then in Edenburgh, commanding them on paine of high treason, that they should depart forth of that towne, & that none of them should come within foure miles of the court, wheresoeuer the same chanced to lie.

Shortlie after, the king himselfe with two thousand men, followed the herald: wherevpon the earle of Angus, both being charged by the herald, and aduertised of the kings coming toward the towne, departed thence immediatlie. And shortlie after, the same herald was sent vnto him againe with commandement from the king, that he should remaine prisoner within ward in the countrie of Murray, till the kings pleasure were further knowne: which he would not obeie; wherefore both he and his adherents were summoned to appeare in parlement to be holden at Edenburgh, in September next following. In this parlement begun at Edenburgh the first of September in this yeare 1528, the earle of Angus, with his brother George Douglas, his vnkle by his father Archibald Douglas, Alexander Monimond of Carnocke, and diuerse other, were by word & of parlement impeached, and forfaited for diuers offenses, and speciallie, for assembling the kings people to haue assailed the kings person: and because he had defended the king against his will with his sword the space of two yeares and more, all which time he stood in feare of his life.

In this parlement Henrie Steward the queenes husband was created lord of Methuen; and made maister of the ordinaunce. Besides which, in place of earle Douglas was Caluin Dunbar, the kings scholemaster made chancelor, a god and a learned man, and one in whome manie did desire more ciuill policie; and in the place of Archibald Douglas the treasurer was admitted Robert Carnicruce, more famous for his monie than his vertue. In this parlement there was onelie one found, called John Bannatine, who fauoring the Douglas, did boldly there protest, that what soeuer was therein don, ought by no meanes to be hurtfull to the earle Douglas; since just feare of his appearance there, was a iust cause to force him to be absent from thence. With in a few daies after, a brother of the earles called William, abbat of the monastirie of Holirhod died, partlie by sicknesse, and partlie by griefe of mind, being wearied with the present state of things; whose place Robert Carnicruce, a man of base birth, but well willed, did obteneid of the king: who had granted vnto him the auoidance of the next spirituall liuing. At length, the Douglas out of hope of all good successe, burnt the townes of Confrandie and Cranfoune, and so fled to the castell of Tantallon.

In October following, the king assembled a great companie of men, with artillerie, and diuerse kinds of munition, to besiege the castell of Tantallon, which the earle of Angus did hold, who aduertised of the preparation made for the same siege, furnished the castell with men and all kind of necessaries, and went himselfe into England. When the siege then was laid about the castell, it was so strong and so well prouided, that it might not be wone for all that could be done at that season: in so much that after David Fauconer, principall gunner of the kings side was slaine, the king caused the siege to be raised; yet at length (though not till a long time after this) it was deliuered to the king by appointment. Before the deliuerie whereof, the king depelle swore that he would not leaue one alie to succeed in the inheritance and name of the Douglas, so long as he liued and was king.

Wherevpon he came to Edenburgh, where (to the end he might distresse them the more) he determined by the aduise of his counsell to send a daillie companie (though no great number) to Coldingham, which should defend the husbandmen from the spoile. Which office appointed to Bothwell chiefe of Louthaine, he did utterlie refuse; either fearing the power of the Douglas (whereunto all the other strength of Scotland did of late, not seeme to be equal) or that he would not (being then young) imbue his hands with the destruction of so famous a familie. since the king durst not trust the Hamiltons (as friends to his enemies, & being offended with them for the death of John Stewart earle of Lennox, nor durst commit the matter to anie of the adjoining nobilitie) at length the same came so about, that Calene Campbell (dwelling on the furthest borders of the kingdome, being a man of good estimation for his wisdom, and approved experience in feats of warre, and for his iustice deerele loued of the people) was sent by the king (with great authoritie) to the rebels. Whereby the Dowglas (being forsaken of the Hamiltons and their other friends) were brought to those extremities, that they were enforced to depart into England to H. Henrie the eight, who honorable and liberrallie received and entertained them. After this, the king (as is said) getting the castell of Tantillone by composition, did scarce keepe all the covenants of his grant thereof in writing; although he performed this, that Alexander Drumman at the request of Robert Bretton, had licence to returne home into his countrie, a little before which (as it seemeth) when James Colville and Robert Carnicruse were removed from the court (as persons suspected to fauor the Dowglas) their offices were bestowed upon Robert Bretton, then in great fauor with the king and courtiers, and aduanced to the gouernement of manie places.)

The eighteenth of Maie, in the yere 1529, the earle of Cathness and the lord of Sinclair, with a great armie by sea passed into Dykenie, to haue taken that Ile into possession; but the people of the countrie assembled at the commandement of James Sinclair of Kirkwall their capteine, who gaue battell to the earle and his armie with such courage, that he discomfited the enemies: the earle with five hundred of his men was slaine, and drowned in the sea, vnto the which they were drunen. The lord Sinclair and all the residue were taken. The Dykenie men held opinion, that their patrone saint Magnus was seene that day to fight in the field on their side against their enemies. In the same moneth on the fiftieth day, there was a great assemble of the lords in Edinburgh, where the king himselfe sate in iudgement. The lord of Hinderland called Cockburne, and one Adam Scot of Tushlatw, who was named king of theues, were accused of theft, and of receiuing and maintaining of theues, slaughters, and other crimes; of the which being conuict, they lost their heads, which were set ouer the Tolbuth of Edinburgh.

On the same day, the earle of Bothwell was also conuict for maintaining them and their crimes, and his life, lands, and goods, were in the kings hands. He was therefore kept in ward within Edinburgh castell, and after sent into Surrey land, & lastlie banished the realme during the kings daies [and remained at Venice.] Also, the lord Marvell, the lord Hume, the lords of Balguth, Fernhurst, Dolorst, Johnson, Marke Bar [with the earle Bothwell] and other principall men of the borders, were conuict by assise, and put in ward: by reason whereof, the borders kept better rule ener after, during the kings reigne. [Few moneths after, the king commanded the noble men (before imprisoned, and then to be banished, to be restored to libertie, taking pledges for their allegiance. Of which companie, one Walter Scot (killing Robert Johnstone a thiefe of noted crueltie, therewith to gratifie the king) began deadie enimitie with that familie, to the great hurt of both those kindreds.]

About this season, a landed man named John Scot, that had trauelled abroad in the world [ouer England, France, Italie and the holie land, as saith Lelcus] who now being returned into Scotland, (because it was byted in other countries that he had fasted 40 daies without either meat or drinke) was for triall therof put in Davids tower in Edinburgh castell, and diligent watch set vpon him to see that he had no sustenance to relieue him withall, and so kept for fortie daies, he fasted all that time without anie kind of nourishment, to the great wonder of the people. In the summer of this yere 1529, Archembald Dowglas, that had bene forsailed (as ye haue heard) came alone to the king while he was on hunting in Striueling parke, & besought his grace of pardon, which he had obtained fullie at his hands, because he fauoured him more than anie of that surname, if he had not bene (as he was indeed) although determined that none of them should remaine within the land at that time, and so he banished him into France, where shortly after through grieve of mind he departed this life.

In the moneth of June, the king with an armie went to the borders to set order there for better rule to be kept, and to punish such as were knownen to be most culpable. And herevpon he caused fortie and eight of the most notable theues, with their capteine John Armstrong to be apprehended; the which being conuict of murther, theft, & treason, were all hanged on growing trees, to the example of other. There was one cruell thefe amongst the rest, which had burned a house with a woman and his children within it: he was burned to death. George Armstrong, brother to John, was pardoned, to the end he should appeach the residue, which he did; so that they were apprehended by the kings commandement, and punished for their misdoings, according as they had deserved. In August following, manie meruellous sights were seene about Striueling, as candels burning on the tops of hills in the nights, and in the morning afore sunne rising. Diuerse armed men appeared fighting vpon the ground, which was taken to be a foretoken of some trouble to insue in those parties. The fiftieth day of August, a great number of people being assembled at the market in Campscenneth, fiftie & two persons were drowned in the ferrie bote; amongst the which were diuerse honest men and women of the countrie.

The first of March, in the yere 1530, the abbat of Colrose called James Inglis, was cruellie murdered by the lord of Tulliallan and his seruants, amongst whom there was a priest called sir William Louthien, for the which they were apprehended, and the said sir William the twentieth and seventh of the same moneth, vpon a publike scaffold in Edinburgh was degraded (the king, quene, and a great companie of people being present) and after his degradation, he was deliuered to the earle of Argile high iustice, and the next day the said Tulliallan and the same priest were beheaded. This yere the college court of iustice called the sessions was instituted in Edinburgh by the king, with consent of the thre estates in parlement assembled, and after confirmed in Rome; in the which are fiftene counsellors ordinarie, eight of them being spirituall persons, of the which the most ancient is president, and seuen temporall men, but so as by this number the chancellor of the realme is aboue the president, when he is present. There are also foure counsellors extraordinarie, removablee at the princes pleasure. In the yere 1531, I find little done to make account of, for the erle of Angus remaining in England, could not perswade the king of England in his fauor, to breake the peace with Scotland, though the same earle earnestlie laboured to bring that to passe.

castell of Edinburgh, & sir John Sandland knight was sent with authoritie to the hermitage (a castell in Liddesdale) to repress the spoiles and robberies committed there. When of ancient time there had bene no certeine daies and place appointed for the deciding of monie, contentions, or debts amongst the citizens and people of Scotland, John duke of Albanie obtained from the bishop of Rome, that a perrelie summe of monie (as much as should be sufficient to paie the stipend of a few iudges that shuld be appointed theretofore) should be leuted of the cleargie, of euerie one according to his estate and substance. Whereupon Gawin Dunbar bishop of Aberdeen for himselfe in the name of the cleargie, appeared to the said bishop of Rome. Which controuersie continued from the first Ides of March, untill the tenth kalends of Maie, at which day the college of the iudges of Edinburgh was established, of whom in the beginning there were many profitable things done, and law was equallie ministred; but yet the same end did not follow which was then hoped amongst them. For since in Scotland there be almost no lawes but such as are decreed by parlement, which are not commonlie perpetuall, but made for a time; and that the iudges as much as in them lieth do hinder the making of such lawes: the goods of all men were committed to the arbitrement of fixt men, which haue perpetuall power theretofore, being in truth but tyrannicall government, since their one lie arbitrements must stand for law. Thus much Buchanan.

But because Lesleus treateth in more ample and other sort of that matter; and for that I will not deprive the reader of the severall writings of them both touching one thing: I will also set downe Lesleus words, writing in this order. In this parlement (saith he) by the consent of the estates, it seemed good that the forme of iudgement used by our ancestors should be taken away. For where certeine of the cleargie, of the barons, and of the citizens, were chosen euerie yere to trauell ouer the foure parts of the realme, to giue iudgement of ciuill causes (as they terme it) and of other things intangled with the controuersie of law: and that then it oftentimes happened either by the ignorance of the iudge that did not attaine to the perfection of the law, or by the malice of them which were corrupted with bribes, that the worse part had vniustlie the upper hand against the right; to which discommoditie this was also ioined, that no cause could be well examined to the uttermost by one man at one time, because the iudges were so often changed; whereby it must needs follow, that severall iudges (having severall minds and wits) must for one matter giue inconstant & contrarie iudgements. Wherefore to take awaie this varietie of iudgements and other discommodities, therewith the common-wealth was afflicted; it pleased the parlement by the perswasion of the king, that a certeine defined number of senators (being persons of the greatest knowledge in law) should haue a permanent place at Edinburgh, to decide all matters of controuersie, the manner & order whereof we haue set downe in our former booke, saith Lesleus. And I for my part thinke not vnmeet for the more explaining thereof, to set it downe in this place out of the same Lesleus.

The companie (saith he) of these men (whom we call the senat of the publike wealth) receiue none but such, whose praise of vertue and sharpenesse of wit (especiallie in matters of law) doth aduance them to that place. This court is so apted of the cleargie and secular nobilitie (as a man may fearme them) that the one part of the lattie doth answer the other number of the cleargie. Which we thinke to be done by the great benefit of God, that the religion and simplicitie of the cleargie may temper the singular wisdom of the tempozaltie, obtained by the experience of worldlie causes; and againe, the iudgement of the lattie may further and moderate the pure religion and ancient simplicitie of the cleargie. Duer all these is one chiefe and head (which is a spirituall man) who hath the highest place in sentence and pronouncing of iudgement; except the iudgement of the chancelor of the kingdome happen to come in place; for then therunto the Scots giue the chiefeest prehemine in all the affaires of the common-wealth. Thus much he.)

In the yere 1532, sir Arthur Darcie was sent to the borders, who being at Berwikke, by the counsell of the earle of Angus then being there, they made a rode into Scotland, and burned certeine places; whereupon the Scots assembling themselves to defend their countrie, made towards the Englishmen, who retired themselves to Berwikke againe. After this were diuerse inuasions made on euerie side by the borders, and ships likewise taken by sea, and yet no warre was proclaimed. In September, in the yere 1533, certeine commissioners of either realme were at Newcastle, to treat for a redresse and recompense to be made for burning of townes and villages, taking of goods, casting downe of piles, taking of ships, slaughters of men, and diuerse other spoiles and iniuries done, as well by the sea as by the land, from the 23 day of Aprill in the yere 1532, unto the day of the meeting of the same commissioners; which dowings were little lesse in effect than had bene used in time of open warre, although the same was not proclaimed. Because therefore that the scathes & iniuries fell out to be so great on both sides, that particular redresse could not be had, the order thereof was referred to the pleasure of both the princes.

Further it was agreed, that for a perpetuall peace to be concluded, certeine commissioners should be appointed to treat therof at London, as afterwards they did. For the king of Scotland there were sent as commissioners about this treatie, William Steuart bishop of Aberdeen, Robert Reid the abbat of Kinlos, and sir Adam Sterburie knight; (as saith Lesleus li. 9. pa. 439.) Adam Otterburne (the which accompanied with diuerse other knights, barons, and gentlemen, came to London, and were there right honorablie receiued the 25 of March. After they had bene before the kings presence, there were certeine commissioners appointed by him to treat with them of peace, the which agreed upon certeine conditions and articles for a peace to continue betwixt both kings during their naturall liues, and one yere after the decease of that prince which first chanced to depart this world: and so the commissioners returned into Scotland in the moneth of Maie next ensuing.

About the same time were sent into France Dauid Beton abbat of Arbuth, and James Erskine secretary, as ambassadoes to require the duke of Mandosmes sister in marriage for the king: with which motion the ladie and hir friends were verie well contented. Whereupon the ladie (as afterwards shall appere) the king himselfe passing secretlie into France in proper person, when he had once seene the ladie, he liked hir not; & so became a suter to the French king his eldest daughter Magdalen, whom he obtained: wherefore the duke of Mandosmes sister would neuer after marry hir selfe with anie other in marriage, but professed hir selfe in a house of religion, where she remained the residue of hir life time. The king of England sent ambassadoes into Scotland, the bishop of Durlesme, sir Thomas Clifford, the prior of Durlesme, refuse, and one doctor Maginus, who were honorable received in the moneth of Julie: and then was the peace before concluded by the ambassadoys at London, confirmed by the king himselfe, and the charter thereof interchangable sealed, with the great seales of both the realmes, during the liues of both the princes (as before ye haue heard.)

* The king in those daies did shew such hope of honorable vertue in him, that the wisest and the most ballant princes of the world did honor him with the ornaments of their orders: for first Henrie king of England adopted him into the order of the garter, the emperor made him a fellow of the golden fleece, and shortly after the French king clothed him with the order of saint Michael. In remembrance of all which (for a note to be left to posteritie) he caused the armes of Scotland, honored with these three orders, to be set vp ouer the gate of his palace of Lithquoe, with the ornaments of the honor of saint Andrew, which are proper to the kingdome of Scotland.)

The same yere, the king passed through the north parts of his realme, and caused iustice done to be ministered in places where he came, against offenders. Moreover, in Edinburgh was great inquisition made, and punishment exercised against such as were detected to hold opinions against the religion then used, the king himselfe assistant thereto. Master Forzman Corleie that was abjured before, and Andrew Stratton that would not renounce his opinion, were burned. The shiriffe of Linlithgow, and diuerse other, that were fled for feare of punishment, were conuict of heresie. Diuerse Englishmen that held against the diuorce betwixt king Henrie, and the ladie Katharine Dowager, fled this yere into Scotland, and were receiued.

* About this time (to conclude a league with Charles the first, emperor) this Charles sent Godescall Errike (to the end the matter might be handled more secretlie) from Toledo (by Ireland) into Scotland, who when he had declared his message to him from the emperor [containing the iniuries done to his aunt Katharine queene of England, & to his daughter by Henrie the eight, king of England: the calling of a generall counsell: the ouerthrow of the Lutherian heresie (to vse Buchanans word) and for contracting of marriage] the said ambassadoy did deliuer to the king the emperors letter, wherein was set downe the offer and choise of which of those three Marias the king would take to wife: which were Marie (the sister of Charles) a widow by Lodowike of Hungarie, his husband slaine by the Turke: Marie of Portingale his nece by his sister Leonara: or Marie of England his cosine germane by his aunt Katharine. Whereunto the king answered, that the marriage with England should be most profitable, but the same was a thing of vncertaine hope, of greater danger & laboꝝ, & of longer delate than his carefulnesse (being the onelie man left of that line) might well indure. Wherefore of all the emperors kindred, that marriage by manie reasons should be most beneficiall for him, to take to wife the daughter of Christern, king of Denmark, begotten vpon Isabel sister to the emperor. Whereunto for deniall thereof, Charles did shortly make answer (at Madrid) that he was affianced to another.)

In the yere 1535, the pope sent a messenger into Scotland, requiring king James to assist him against the king of England, whome he had decreed an heretike, a schismaticke, a wedlocke breaker, a publicke murderer, and a sacrileger; and therefore he had declared him to be depriued of the said kingdome, the which he would bestow vpon him, and other catholicke princes. In the yere 1536, the king toke the sea with fine ships, without knowledge of the most part of the lords of his realme, and sailed about the Isles of Skie and Lelues, and the other Isles, and by Forne was driuen to take land at saint Piniens in Galloway, & so returned to Striueling, from whence he passed on foot in pilgrimage vnto our ladie chappell of Lauret beside Dunkelburgh, and afterward sent for diuerse of his lords, and by their counsell toke his boiage againe by sea with fine ships, to passe into France, as he was minded to haue done the first time: but what caused him to alter his purpose then, we find not. This second time he embarked at Harke, kaldie the last of August, and with good and prosperous wind he shortly after arrived in France, there being with him in companie the earles of Argile, and Arrane, the lords Bold and Fleming, with diuerse other barons, knights, and gentlemen; and before him there were in France the earles of Murray, Lennox, and Castiles, the lord Erskin, the abbat of Arbuthnot, and others.

Immediately after his arrivall, he rode in secret manner disguised vnto Wandolmes in Picardie, taking with him but one seruant named John Tennent, whome he caused to take vpon him as he had bene maister; and so comming to the duke of Wandolme his place, got sight of the ladie who shuld haue bene his wife; but not liking hir, he returned againe without talking either with hir or hir friends: and comming to Rouen where his companie were abiding for him, he passed from thence towards Paris, where the Dolphin of France was appointed by the king his father to meet him seven leagues from the citie, who brought him to the king, who receiued him in such hartie manner, as if he had bene his owne sonne, and with as much honor as might haue bene shewed to the greatest prince in earth. There were iustes, tourneys, and other princelie pastimes practised and set forth; in which iustes and other exercises of warlike feates, he shewed himselfe as hardie, cunning and ballant, as anie other person within all the realme of France, for the which he wan passing great praise.

In the meane time, he caused his ambassadoys and the noble men that were with him, to declare vnto the king of France, that the cause of his comming was for marriage to be had betwene him and the ladie Magdalen, eldest daughter to the king, whome he loued & fauoured aboue all other within his realme. The French king was glad hereof, that the ancient band betwixt Scotland and France might thus with new aliance be confirmed, and therefore declared that he would willingly giue him his daughter in marriage. But herewith he let him vnderstand, that his daughter was much subiect to sicknesse, and therefore he referred that vnto the king of Scotland his owne pleasure, whether he would haue hir, or his yongest daughter the ladie Margaret, who was after married to the duke of Sauoy. This offer of choise being reported to the king of Scotland, he continued in his former purpose, which was, to match with the ladie Magdalen, who was in deed a pleasant yong ladie, beautifull, of good fauour, louelie countenance, and comelie manners, aboue all others within that realme.

Wherevpon the marriage was contracted betwixt them, and an hundred thousand crownes of the sun promised with hir in dowrie, with thirtie thousand franks of pension, during the life of king James: which monie was deliuered vnto him at his returne homewards, besides manie rich hangings, cupboards of plate, sumptuous apparell, and rich iewels giuen to him and his wife, farre aboue the summe of an other hundred thousand crownes, with two great ships (the one called the salamander) and great plenty of artillerie, powder, and other munition. uer, all his charges and expences were borne by the French king, during his being within the realme of France. At the same time also, was the ancient league and bond of amitie betwixt the two realmes of Scotland and France renewed, and the day of the solemnization of the marriage appointed to be holden the first of Januarie.

In the meane time, great preparation for the same was made, and all the nobles of France sent for to be there at that day. On the which within the church of Notre dame in the citie of Paris, the king of Scotland openlie married the said ladie Magdalen, in presence of the king his father, the king of Navarre, seven cardinals, and diuerse great dukes, marquesses, earles, lords, barons, bishops, & others. After the solemnization of the marriage, king James remained in France, till the moneth of Maie, passing the time with all kind of pleasure and disport that might be deuised for his honorable interteinement. Finally, the king and his wife quene Magdalen toke their leaue of the king of France their father at Paris, about the latter end of Aprill, and so rode to Rouen; where they were receiued with great triumph, and from thence they passed downe the river to Newhauen where they embarked, being accompanied by the admerall of France, and manie other noble men of the realme, appointed by the French king to attend vpon them into Scotland, & so they sailed forth with pleasant wind and prosperous weather, through the seas, till they came into the Forth, and there landed at the peare of Liethauen, the 29 of Maie, in the yeere 1537, where a great number of earles, bishops, barons, & other noble men & gentlemen of Scotland were readie to receiue them with passing ioy and gladnesse, & from thence with great triumph they were conueied to the abbey of Holie rood house.

This noble ladie with hir louelie countenance and seemlie demeanour, at hir first arrivall wone the loues and hartie good wills of all the nobles & people of the realme, and withall contented so highlie the mind and fantasie of the king hir husband, that there was neuer more hope of wealth and prosperitie to succeed within the realme, than at that present. But fortune ennieng so great felicitie, would not suffer them to continue anie longer time together: for about the end of June she fell sicke of a vehement fever, whereof she departed this life the tenth of Julie next ensuing, and was buried in the church of Holie rood house, for whose death the king was verie sorrowfull, & stirred not abroad of a long time after: [whose death (saith Buchanan) was so lamented of all men, that then (as he supposeth) began the first vse of mourning garments amongst the Scots, which yet at this day, not being past fortie yeeres, is not verie common, though publicke orders and manners doe uerie day grow worse and worse.]

In the summer of this yeere, Jone Dowglas the ladie of Glames, sister to the earle of Angus, was apprehended, and likewise hir husband David Lion, and both of them brought to Edinburgh, where they were accused and conuict by an assise, for conspiracie of the kings death: the said ladie was burned, and hir husband hanged. Hir son the lord Glames was also conuict for misprision and concealment of that crime, and therfore forfaiting all his lands, was condemned to die: but because he was young and of tender yeeres, the king pardoned him of life, and commanded him to perpetuall prison, in the which he remained so long as the king liued. [This yeere was Bothwell, for that he was ouer familiar with the English, banished into France (as saith Buchanan.)] Shortlie after, John maister of the Forbois, and eldest sonne to the lord Forbois, who had married a sister of the said ladie Glames, was at Edinburgh likewise indicted and conuict by an assise, by procurement of the earle Huntley, for the like conspiracie of the kings death, for the which he was beheaded and quartered, and his head and quarters set aloft vpon the gates of Edinburgh. His father the lord Forbois, vpon suspicion of the same conspiracie, was long after kept in prison within the castell of Edinburgh; but at length when nothing might be proued against him, he was released and set at libertie.

This yeere, the king in September caused iustices to sit in the north parts of the realme, and likewise in October; and in the winter following he caused the like to be done in the south and west parts. The king himselfe was often times present, assisting the lords whome he had appointed his commissioners for the furtherance of iustice, and maintenance thereof throughout all parts of his realme. The king appointed an assemblie of the nobles, by whose consent an edict was made to confirme the former law, in which all his grants made at Roane in his minority were voided and of no authoritie. At what time also by the said persons it was brought to passe by great labor, that the kings patrimonie should be augmented with manie possessions. Wherefore when they perceived that the kings charge and dignitie could not be maintained with so small reuenues, they aduanced his foure sonnes (borne of diuerse women) to the rich abbeies & priories of Melrose, Kelso, Coldingham, Holie rood, and of saint Andrewes, whose reuenues they transferred to the kings coffers so long as he liued: by which (perhaps) there came no lesse monie (saith Lesleus) vnto his coffers, than did arise of his kinglie inheritance.)

The king by the aduise of these noble men of his realme, thinking it necessarie for him to match againe in marriage with some noble princeesse, sent into France vnto the earle of Murray, and David Beaton abbat of Arbroth [whome (as saith Lesleus lib. 9. p. 447) Paule the third had made a cardinal, & they of France had made bishop of Airopeuse] his ambassadors there resident, willing them by the aduise of the French king to treat for a marriage to be had betwixt him and the ladie Marie de Lorraine, dutchesse of Longuile, widow, daughter to the duke of Guise. And being aduertised from his said ambassadors, that the king of France, the ladie hir selfe, and hir friends, were well contented therewith, he sent in the beginning of Maie the lord Robert Marwell, and the maister of Glencarne, well accompanied into France, to ioine with his other ambassadors for the contracting of that marriage, the which according to their commission treated thereof, and concluded vpon resolute articles, and so espoused hir by procurators, as the vse is amongst such estates, with great triumph in the citie of Paris, whereat the king and manie noble men were present.

After this she was conueied to Newhauen, and there taking the seas, passed through the same till she came to Carrell in Fife, where she landed the tenth of June; and from thence she was conueied to the new palace in the abbey of saint Andrewes, being honorable prepared for the receiuing of hir. And there the king accompanied with manie noble men, openlie solemnized and confirmed the fore said marriage with the said ladie in the abbey church, with great ioy and triumph. The king with his quene remained there the most part of that summer. And within a few moneths after the marriage, she conceived with child, to the great comfort of the king and the whole realme, for the hope of succession thereby; and therefore general processions and publicke praiers were made throughout all parts of the realme, for the prosperous success of the same. After that the king had pacified the borders borders and all other parts of his realme, by exercising of iustice, and traueilling about the same in his owne person through all places (where need required) so that there was as great quietnesse, rest, and policie vsed in Scotland, as euer was in anie kings daies before him: yet neuertheless there were certaine disobedient persons in the Isles.

The king therefore, to bring them to order, caused to prepare a good nauie of ships, and in the moneth of Maye went aboard the same in the rode of Lethy, hauing with him the earles of Arrane, Huntlye, Argyll, and diuerse other earles, lords, and barons, with whom he sailed forth by the coasts of Fife, Angus, Aberdeen, Murray, Southerrland, and Cathness, till he came to Orkney, where he landing and all his companie with him, were receiued with honorable by the bishop Robert Marcell. Here they furnished themselves with fresh vittells, and other such things as were necessarie; and taking the seas againe, sailed to the Isles of Skie and Lewes, where Mac Clewd of the Lewes, a principall clan of his kin, was brought vnto the king, who sent forth also a companie to Mac Clewd Bangh, who came likewise out of his Ile, and presented himselfe to the king.

From thence the king sailed by the coast of Rosse & Buntail, to the Ile of Eranternes, where diuerse of the Maconiles, such as the lord Magarrie, John Godart, and others (who alledged themselves to be of the principall blood, and lords of the Isles) were brought also to the kings presence. From thence traueilling through the residue of the Isles, Macclane and James Maconile of Winter, being the two principall capteins of the small Isles, came likewise to the king who at length landed at Dunbretton, and sent the capteins and ships with prisoners to passe the same waie he came round about the coast, so to come to Edinburgh, where the same prisoners being arrived, the chiefe heads of them were kept in ward as pledges for good rule in their countries, and were not suffered to depart so long as the king liued, whereby there followed great quietnesse, and as good obedience to the lawes throughout all the Isles, as there was in anie part of the realme; and as good account and payment made to the kings controller in his exchequer for the lands of the same Isles pertaining to the crowne, as for anie part of the reuenues belonging thereto within the maine land. [In this yere (saith Buchanan lib. 4.) were manie taken for Lutheranisme, wherof some were burnt; nine recanted, and manie were banished: amongst whom, George Buchanan was one, who escaped by a rope out of a window of a chamber.]

Whilest the king was in this bondage, the quene was deliuered of a sonne at saint Andrewes, where of the king being aduertised at his landing, hastied with all possible diligence to the quene; and shortly after was the child baptised, and called James. The archbishop of saint Andrewes, and the earle of Arrane were godfathers, and the quene the kings mother was godmother. For the birth of this prince, there were bounties made through all parts of the realme, with great triumph and giuing of thanks to God for the same. After this the quene, mother to the king, returned vnto Methuen, where after she had remained a certaine time, a sicknesse took hir, of the which shortly after she departed this life, and was buried in the Charterhouse church of saint Johns towne, by the towne of king James the first. The king himselfe and manie nobles of the realme were present at the funerals, which were kept in most solemne and pompous manner.

The same yere were burnt at Edinburgh for heresie (as it was then taken) a regular canon, two blacke friers, and a secular man. Also two priests were degraded, and condemned to perpetual prison. The same time there was a grate fier in the citie of Glasgow burnt for the like cause, and manie other summoned; and because they would not appeare, they were deniounced hereticks. About the same time, James Beton archbishop of saint Andrewes, a man of great age departed this life, and was buried in saint Andrewes. Before his departure, he had provided successours to all his benefices, first to his archbishops see, and to the abbey of Arbroth, maister David Beton, afterwards cardinal; and to the abbey of Dunfermling maister George Durie that was archdeacon of saint Andrewes. These men, without anie gainesaying of the king, entered with his good will into the same benefices, immediately after his deceasse. This James Beton builded a great part of the new college of saint Andrewes, and left great summes of monie and treasure to go through to make an end of the same worke.

This yere in the moneth of August sir James Hamilton of Finhart knight, remaining as then in the towne of Edinburgh, was arrested by David Wood controller to the king, who charged him in the kings name to go to ward within the castle of Edinburgh. Which commandement he willingly obeyed, thinking himselfe sure inough, as well by reason of the good seruice he had done to the king, specially in repairing the palaces of Strueling and Linlithgow; as also for that the king had him in so high fauor, that he stood in no feare of himselfe at all. Neuertheless, shortly after he was brought forth to iudgement, and confuted in the Tolbooth of Edinburgh, of certaine points of treason laid against him, which he would neuer confesse; but that notwithstanding, he was beheaded in the moneth of September next ensuing [after that he had liberallie confessed at the place of execution, that he had neuer in anie sort offended the kings maiestie, and that this death was yet more thanlie inflicted vpon him by the diuine iustice; because he had often offended the lawes of God to please the prince, thereby to obtaine greater countenance with him. Wherefore he admonished all persons, that (moued by his example) they should rather follow the diuine pleasure, than vnjustlie seeke the kings fauor, since it is better to please God than man.]

This summer the quene remaining at Strueling, was deliuered of another prince, which was baptised in the chappell of Strueling, and called Arthur; but within eight daies after, the said prince deceased at Strueling aforesaid. On the verie same daie, prince James the kings eldest sonne being at saint Andrewes departed this life also, in such wise, that there was but onlie six houres betwixt the time of their departures out of this world; which caused no lesse lamentation through the whole realme, than there was ioy at their births. After this, the quene went vnto saint Johns towne, where she was honorably receiued with great triumph made by the towne. She was accompanied with the principall men of the countrie, and from thence the roade to Aberdeen, the king then being come vnto hir, where, by the towne and vniuersitie they were receiued with great ioy, triumph, pageants, verses, & plates, set forth in the best manner for their pastime. They remained there the space of fiftene daies, and were highly entertained by the bishop of that place.

There were exercises and disputations held in all kind of sciences in the colleges and scholes, with diuerse orations made in Greeke, Latine, and other languages, to the high praise and commendation of the maisters & students in that vniuersitie. From thence the king with the quene returned to Dundee, where a coffie entrie was prepared for them also, and after they had bene right princelie interteined there, they came to Falkeland. In the moneth of Aprile, sir John Bozthwike, commonlie called capteine Bozthwike, suspected, defamed, and accused of heresie, was summoned to appeare in saint Andrews before the cardinal, and diuerse other bishops and prelates there present, where (notwithstanding his absence) the same being proued by sufficient witnesse against him (as was thought) he was conuicted and declared an heretike. An image was made to resemble him, and at the market crosse of the said citie, as a signe and memorie of his condemnation, it was burned, to the feare of others, but he himselfe escaped their hands and got into England, where he was receiued.

The king of Scots (hearing of the maner of the king of England, and how he honored himselfe) toke in euill part, that the king of England in all generall assemblies of the states of Ireland did call himselfe king of Ireland, when all his predecessours before were onelie intituled by the names of lords of Ireland. For by that new title, king James his authoritie did seeme to be diminished, when the king of England did write himselfe king of all Ireland: whereof a portion by many ages was vnder the rule of the king of Scots. Yet at length k. James did yeld therunto; and that the rather, because the king of England vnder this title and authoritie, did not dispossesse the heires of the Scot Spakeconell; and other his Scots of those lands which they there inioied in that countrie.]

This yere the king of England aduertised of the meeting of the emperor, the French king, and pope, at the citie of Nice, doubting some practise to be devised there against him, sent to the king of Scotland the bishop of saint Dauides, & the lord William Howard, desiring him as his most tender kinsman and nephue, to meete him at the citie of Forke in England, where he would communicat such things with him, as should be for the weale of both the realmes. And therewith the king of England, trusting that the king of Scotland would haue fulfilled his desire, caused great preparation to be made at Forke for the receiuing of him. But albeit the king of Scotland was willing of himselfe to haue passed into England, to haue met and seene his uncle; yet after long reasoning and deliberation of his counsell and prelates [especiallie James Beton bishop of saint Andrews, and George Crichtoune bishop of Aberdeen (as saith Buchanan. lib. 14.) assembled for that purpose, casting in their minds (as they toke it) what danger might fall to him and his realme, if he should passe into England, in case he should be staied and holden there, contrarie to his will, as king James his predecessour was, hauing no succession of his bodie.

And againe, for that it was certeinlie knowne, that the principall cause, why the king of England required this meeting or interuiew, was to persuaade the king of Scotland to vse the like order in Scotland, as he had done within his realme of England, in abolishing the popes authoritie, making himselfe supreme head of the church, expelling religious persons out of their houses, and seizing the iewels of their houses, their lands and rents, and such like inuormation. And if it chanced the king should attempt the like, they should lose the friendship which was betwixt him, the pope, the emperor, and French king, that were his great friends and confederats. Whereupon they persuaaded him to staie, and by their aduise sent pleasant letters & messages vnto the said king of England, desiring him to haue him excused, for that he could not come into England at that time, hauing such lets and causes of abiding at home, as thoztie he should vnderstand by his ambassadors, whom he ment to send to him, as well for this matter as other causes. And thoztie after sir James Leirmouth was appointed to go as ambassador into England, as well to make the kings excuse for his not coming to meet the king of England at Forke; as also to make complaint vpon certein inuasions made by the borderers of England into Scotland, and also for the vsing of the debatable ground betwixt the two realmes.

But the king of England soze offended that the king of Scots would not satisfie his request, to meet him at Forke (as before is recited, would admit no excuse, but determined to make warre into Scotland, albeit as the Scottishmen allege, he would not suffer the same to be vnderstood, till he had prepared all things in a readinesse. In the meane time he sent commissioners to meet with the Scots commissioners vpon the debatable ground, to talke for redresse to be made of harmes done vpon the borders, but no good conclusion could be agreed vpon by these commissioners, neither touching the debatable land, nor yet for repairing of wrongs done by the inuasions. ¶ But that the truth concerning the causes of this war, moued at this present by that noble prince king Henrie the eight, may the better appeare; I haue thought good here to set downe the same, as they were drawen forth and published in print to the whole world by the said king in a little pamphlet, vnder this title.

A declaration containing the iust causes and considerations of this present warre with the Scots, wherein also appeareth the true and right title that the kings most roiall maiestie hath to his fouereigntie of Scotland, and thus it beginneth.

BEing now inforced to the war which we haue alwaies hitherto so much abhorred & fled, by our neighbour & nephue the k. of Scots, one who aboue all other for our manifold benefitts toward him, hath most iust cause to loue vs, and to reioice in our quietnesse; we haue thought good to notifie vnto the world his doings and behauiour in the prouocation of this war, & likewise the meanes & waies by vs to eschew & auoid it, & the iust & true occasions wherby we be now prouoked to prosecute the same, and by vtterance and disclosing of that matter, to disburden some part of our inward displeasure and griefe: and the circumstances knownen, to lament openlie with the world the infidelitie of this time, in which things of such enormitie doe burst out and appeare.

The king of Scots our nephue & neighbor, whom we in his youth and tender age preserved and maintained from the great danger of others, and by our authoritie and power conducted him safelie to the roiall possession of his estate, he now compelleth & inforceth vs (for preservation of our honor & right) to vse our puissance & power against him. The like unkindnesse hath bene heretofore shewed by other in semblable cases against Gods law, mans law, & all humanitie; but the oftener it chanceth, the more it is to be abhorred, and yet in the persons of princes, for the raritie of them, can so happen but seldome as it hath now come to passe. It hath bene verie rarelie & seldome seene tofore, that a king of Scots hath had in marriage a daughter of England. We cannot nor will not reprehend the king our fathers act therein, but lament and be sozie that it toke no better effect.

amitie, and perpetuall friendship betwene the posteritie of both: which howe sone it failed, the death of the king of Scots, as a due punishment of God, for his vniust inuasion into this our realme, is and shall be a perpetuall testimonie of their reproch for euer. And yet in that present time could not the vniuersitie of the father extinguish in vs the naturall loue of our nephue his sonne, being then in the miserable age of tender youth. But we then forgetting the displeasure that should haue worthilie prouoked vs to inuade that realme, nourished and brought vp our nephue, to attaine his fathers possession and gouernement, wherein he now so vnkindlie vseth and behaueth himselfe towards vs, as he compelleth vs to take armes and warre against him.

It is speciallie to be noted, vpon what grounds, and by what means we be compelled to this warre, wherein among other is our chiefe grieue and displeasure, that vnder a colour of faire speech and flattering words, we be indeed so injured, contemned and despised, as we ought not with sufferance to permit and passe ouer. Words, writings, letters, messages, ambassages, excuses, allegations, could not more pleasantlie, more gentlie, nor more reuerentlie be deuised and sent, than hath bene made on the king of Scots behalfe vnto vs: and euer we trusted the tree would bring forth good fruit, that was of the one part of so good a stocke, and continuallie in appearance put forth so faire buds: and therefore would hardlie beleue or giue eare to other, that euer alledged the deeds of the contrarie, being neuertheless the same deeds so manifest, as we must needs haue regarded them, had not we bin so loth to thinke euill of our nephue, whome we had so manie waies bound to be of the best sort toward vs.

And therefore hauing a message sent vnto vs the yere past, from our said nephue, and a promise made for the repairing of the said king of Scots vnto vs to Porke, and after great preparation on our part made therefore, the same meeting was not onelie disappointed, but also at our being at Porke in the lieu thereof, an inuasion made by our said nephue his subiects into our land, declaring an euident contempt and despite of vs. We were yet glad to impute the default of the meeting to the aduise of his counsell, and the inuasion to the lewdnesse of his subiects, and according thereto gaue as benigne and gentle audience to such ambassadoes as repaired hither at Christmas afterwarde, as if no such cause of displeasure had occurred, speciallie considering the good words, sweet words, pleasant words, effronteries proponed by the said ambassadoes, not onelie to excuse that was past, but also to perswade kindnesse and perfect amitie to insue.

And albeit the king of Scots hauing (contrarie to the article of the league of amitie) receiued and entertained such rebels as were of the cheefe and principall, in stirring the insurrection in the north against vs, with refusall before time, vpon request made to restore the same; yet neuertheless, vpon offer made, the said ambassadoes to send commission to the borderers, to determine debates of the confines in the same, with so great a pretense of amitie, and so faire words as could be in speech desired, we were content for the time to forbear to presse them ouer extreame in the matter of rebels. Albeit we neuer remitted the same, but desiring to make triall of our said nephue in some correspondence of deeds, condescended, to the sending of commissioners to the borders, which to our great charge we did, and the king of Scots our said nephue the semblable.

Where after great trauell made by our commissioners, this fruit insued, that being for our part challenged, a peece of our ground plainlie vsurped by the Scots, and of no great value, being also for the same shewed such euidence, as more substantiall, more authenticke, plaine and euident, cannot be brought forth for anie part of ground within our realme: the same was neuertheless by them denied, refused, and the euidence onelie for this cause reiected, that it was made (as they alledged) by Englishmen: and yet it was so ancient, as it could not be counterfeited now, and the value of the ground so little, and of so small weight, as no man would haue attempted to falsifie for such a matter. And yet this deniall being in this wise made vnto our commissioners, they neuertheless by our commandement departed as friends from the commissioners of Scotland, taking order as hath bene accustomed, for good rule vpon the borders in the meane time.

After which their recess, the lord Darwell wariden of the west marches of Scotland, made proclamation for good rule; but yet added therewith, that the borderers of Scotland should withstand their goods from the borderers of England; and incontinent the Scottishmen borderers, the fourth of Julie entered into our realme suddenly, and spoiled our subiects contrarie to our leagues, euen after such extremitie as it had bene in the time of open warre, whereat we much marvelled, and were compelled therefore to furnish our borders with a garrison for defense of the same. Wherevpon the king of Scots sent vnto vs James Leirmouth maister of his household, with letters deuised in the most pleasant manner, offering redresse & reformation of all attempts. And yet neuertheless, at the entrie of the said Leirmouth into England, a great number of the Scots then not looked for, made a forraie into our borders, to the great annoiance of our subiects, & to their extreme detriment. Wherewith, and with that vnseemlie dissimulation, we were not a little moued, as reason would we should; and yet did we not finally so extreamelie prosecute and continue our said displeasure, but that we gaue benigne audience to the said Leirmouth, and suffered our selfe to be somewhat altered by his words and faire promises, tending to the perswasion that we euer desired, to find the king of Scots such a nephue vnto vs, as our proximity of blood (with our gratuitie vnto him) did require.

In the meane time of these faire words, the deeds of the borderers were as extreme as might be, and our subiects spoiled: and in a robe made by sir Robert Bowes for a reuenge thereof, the same sir Robert Bowes, with manie other were taken prisoners, and yet detained in Scotland without putting them to fine or rancome, as hath bene euer accustomed. And being at the same time a surseilance made on both sides, at the sute of the said Leirmouth for a season; the Scots ceased not to make sundrie inuasions into our realme, in such wise as we were compelled to forget faire words, and onelie to consider the king of Scots deeds, which appeared vnto vs of that sort, as they ought not for our dutie in defense of our subiects, we could not in respect of our honor, be passed ouer vnreformed: and therefore put in a readinesse our armie, as a due meane whereby we might attaine such a peace, as for the safeguard of our subiects we be bound to procure.

After which preparation made, and knowledge had thereof, the king of Scots ceased not to vse his accustomed meane of faire words, which in our naturall inclination wrought effronteries their accustomed effect, euer more desirous to find in the king of Scots such regard & respect to be declared in deeds, as the correspondence of naturall loue in the nephue to such an vncle, as we haue shewed our selfe toward him, doth require. Wherefore vpon new request and sute made vnto vs, we determined to state our armie mie at Poike, appointing the duke of Norfolke our lieutenant, the Lord primate seale, the bishop of Durham, and the maister of our hostes, there to commen, treat, and conclude with the ambassadoys of Scotland, for an amitie and peace, vpon such conditions, as by reason and equitie were indifferent, whereby the warre might be eschewed, being by sundrie inuasions of the Scots then opened & manifest.

In this communication betwene our and their commissioners, after diuerse degrees of commission shewed by the Scots, and finallie one that was by our commissioners allowed, matters were proposed for conclusion of amitie, nothing difficult or hard of our part, but so agreeable to reason, as the commissioners of Scotland said they doubted not, but if it might be brought to passe that the king of Scots our nephew might haue a meeting with vs, all matters should easilie be compounded and determined: whereupon they left speaking of anie articles of amitie, and the ambassadoys of Scotland made much outward toy in communication of meeting. They shewed themselves in words, fashion, and behauior much to delight in it, to reioice in it, and therewith thought it easie and facile to be concluded and accomplished, and for their part they took it then for a thing passed, a thing concluded, and most certeine to take effect, and onelie desired six daies to obtaine answer from their maister, and our armie, from that time to staie and go no further: wherevnto our commissioners then agreed.

After these six daies was sent a commission out of Scotland, with power to conclude a meeting precise at such a place, as they knew well we should not, nor could not in winter obserue & keepe. Whereupon when our commissioners were discontent, the ambassadoys of Scotland to relieue that displeasure, and to temper the matter whereby to win more time, shewed forth their instructions, wherein libertie was giuen to the ambassadoys to exceed their commission in the appointment of the place, and to consent to anie other that by our commissioners should be thought convenient. Which manner of proceeding when our commissioners refused, alledging that they would not conclude a meeting with men hauing no commission therevnto: the ambassadoys of Scotland vpon pretense to send for a more ample and large commission, agreeable to their instructions for appointment of the place, obtained a delaye of other six daies, to send for the ample commission without restraint of place.

Now after these six daies they brought forth a new commission, made in a good forme, and without exception: but therewith also they shewed new instructions, containing such a restraint as the former commission did containe, so as the libertie giuen to the commissioners in the commission was now at the last removed and taken away by the instructions, with addition of a speciall charge to the ambassadoys, not to exceed the same. And thus, first the ambassadoys of Scotland seemed to haue a will and desire to conclude on a place seemelie and convenient, which for want of commission they might not do, and at the last might haue concluded a meeting by vertue of their commission; and then for feare of the commandement in their second instructions they durst not. And so they shewed their first instructions partlie to excuse their king, who should seeme secretlie to will more than in the commission he did openlie professe.

Then with an ample commission from the king, they shewed their secret instructions for defense of themselves, why they proceeded not according to their commission, not caring how much they charged therein the king, whose fault they disclosed to discharge themselves, trusting that by the benefit of the winter approaching, and the time lost in their communication, their maister should be defended against our power for this yeere, without doing for their part what by honor, right, law, and leagues they be obliged and bound to do. And in this meane time our subiects being taken prisoners in Scotland, could not be deliuered vpon any rancome, contrarie to all custome and vse of the borderers in the time of peace and warre: and in this meane time staied a great part of our armie already pressed, and in our wages to go forward.

In this time ambassadoys (as ye haue heard) assembled to make of an amitie, but concluded none. The treating of amitie was put ouer by communication of a meeting. The communication of meeting was so handled by alteration of commission and instructions on their behalfe, as it appeareth a plaine deuise onelie inuented for a delaye, which hath giuen vs light, wherevpon more certeinly to iudge the king of Scots inward affection toward vs: whose deeds and words well weighed and considered, do vs plainlie to vnderstand, how he hath continually labored to abuse vs with sweet and pleasant words, and to satisfie the appetites of other at home and abroad with his triking and displeasing deeds. In his words he professeth an indissoluble amitie, he allegeth kindred, he acknowledgeth benefits, onelie the fault is, that he speaketh another language to all the world in deeds, and thereby so toucheth vs in honor and denegation of iustice, as we be enforced and compelled to vse the sword, which God hath put in our hands as an extreme remedie, whereby to obtaine both quietnesse for our subiects, and also that is due to vs by right, pacts, and leagues.

We haue patientlie suffered manie delusions, and notable the last yeere, when we made preparation at Poike for his repaire to vs. But should we suffer our people and subiects to be so oft spoiled without remedie? This is done by the Scots, whatsoever their words be. Should we suffer our rebels to be detained contrarie to the leagues without remedie? This is also done by them, whatsoever their words be. Should we suffer our land to be usurped contrarie to our most plaine euidence, onelie vpon a will, pride and arrogancie of the other partie? This is done by them whatsoever their words be. All these be ouer presumptuouslie done against vs, and giue such signification of their arrogancie, as it is necessarie for vs to oppresse it in the beginning, least they should gather further courage, to the greater displeasure of vs and our posteritie hereafter. And yet in the intreating of this matter, if we had not euidentlie perceived the lacke of such affection as proximity of blood should require; we would rather haue remitted these iniuries in respect of proximity of blood, to our nephew, than we did to fore his fathers inuasion.

But weeing that we be so suerlie ascertained of the lacke thereof, and that our blood is there frozen with the cold aire of Scotland, there was neuer prince more violentlie compelled to war, than we be by the vnikind dealing, vniust behauior, & vnpincelie demeanour of him, that yet in nature is our nephew, & in his acts and deeds declareth himselfe not to be moued therewith, nor to haue such earnest regard to the obseruation of his pacts & leagues, nor such respect to the intertainment of the administration of iustice, as naturall equitie bindeth, & conseruation of equitie requireth. Which we much lament & be sorie for, & vse now our force and puissance against him, not for reuengement of our priuate displeasure (being so often deliuered as we haue borne) but for recouerie of our right, the preservation of our subiects from iniuries, and the obseruation of such leagues as as haue passed betwene vs, firmelie trusting, that almightie God, vnder whome we reigne, will assist & aid our iust proceedings herein, to the furtherance and aduancement of the right, which we doubt not shall euer preuaile against wrong, falshood, deceit, and dissimulation.

Hitherto appeareth how this present warre hath not proceeded of anie demand of our right of our superiortie, which the kings of Scots haue alwaies knowledged by homage and fealtie to our progenitors euen from the beginning: but this warre hath bene prouoked and occasioned vpon present matter of displeasure, present iniurie, present wrong mistred by the nephue to the vncle most vnnaturalie, and supported contrarie to the deserts of our benefits most vnkindlie, if we had minded the possession of Scotland, and by the motion of warre to attaine the same, there was neuer king of this realme had more opportunitie in the minoritie of our nephue, nor in anie other realme a prince that hath more iust title, more euident title, more certeine title, to any realme that he can claime, than we haue to Scotland.

This title is not deuised by pretense of marriage, nor imagined by couenant, nor contriued by intencion of argument, but lineallie descended from the beginning of that estate established by our progenitors, and recognised successiuelie of the kings of Scotland, by deeds, wordes, acts, and writings continuallie almost without interruption, or at the least intermission, till the reigne of our progenitor king Henrie the first, in whose time the Scots abused the ciuill warre of this realme, to their licence and boldnesse, in omitting of their dutie: which for the proritie of blood betwene vs, we haue bene slacke to require of them, being also of our selfe inclined to peace, as we haue euer bene alwaies glad, rather without preiudice to omit to demand our right if it might conserue peace, than by demanding thereof to be seene to moue warre, specialie against our neighbour, against our nephue, against him whome we haue preserved from danger, and in such a time as it were expedient for all christendome to be in vnitie and peace, whereby to be more able to resist the common enimie the Turke.

But for what considerations we haue omitted to speake hitherto of the matter, it is neuertheless true, that the kings of Scots haue alwaies acknowledged the kings of England superior lords of the realme of Scotland, & haue done homage and fealtie for the same. This appereth first in histories written by such, as for confirmation of the truth in memorie haue trulie noted and signified the same. Secondly, it appeareth by instruments of homage made by the kings of Scots, and diuerse notable personages of Scotland, at diuerse & sundrie times sealed with their seales, and remaining in our treasure. Thirdlie, it appeareth by registers and records iudicialle and autenticallie made, yet preferred for confirmation of the same. So as the matter of title being most plaine, is furnished also with all maner of euidences for declaration thereof.

First, as concerning histories, which be called witnesses of times, the light of truth, and the life of memorie, and finally the conuenient way & meane whereby the things of antiquitie may be brought to mens knowledge, they shew as plainlie this matter as could be wished or required, with such a consent of writers as could not so agree vpon an vntruth, containing a declaration of such matter as hath most euident probabilitie and apparance. For as it is probable and likelie, that for the better administration of iustice amongst rude people, two or more of one estate might be rulers in one countrie, united as this Ile is: so it is probable and likelie, that in the beginning it was so ordered for auoiding dissention, that there should be one superiour, in right of whom the said estates should depend.

According whereunto we read, how Brute, of whome the realme then called Britaine took first that name (being before that time inhabited with giants, a people without order or ciuilitie) had three sonnes, Locrine, Albanact, and Camber, who determining to haue the whole Ile within the ocean sea to be after gouerned by them three, appointed Albanact to rule that now is called Scotland, Camber the parties of Wales, and Locrine that now is called England: vnto whom (his being the eldest sonne) the other two brethren should doe homage, recognising and knowledging him as their superiour. Now consider, if Brute conquered all this Ile, as the historie saith he did, and then in his owne time made this order of superiortie as afore; how can there be a title deuised of a more plaine beginning, a more iust beginning, a more conuenient beginning, for the order of this Ile, at that time specialie, when the people were rude: which cannot without continuall strife and variance containe two or three rulers in all points equall without any maner of superiortie, the inward conscience and remorse of which superiortie should in some part dull and diminish the peruerse courage of resistance and rebellion.

The first diuision of this Ile, we find written after this sort, without cause of suspicion why they should write amisse. And according herunto we find also in historie set forth by diuerse, how for transgression against this superiortie, our predecessors haue chastised the kings of Scots, and some depose, and put other in their places. We will here omit to speake of the rudenesse of the antiquitie in particularitie, which they cared not dissimulie to commit to writing. But some authours, as Antonius Sabellicus, amongst other, diligentlie searching what he might trulie write of all Europe and the Ilands adioining, ouer and besides that which he writeth of the natures, manners, and conditions of the Scots, which who so list to read, shall find to haue bene the verie same in times past, that we find them now at this present: he calleth Scotland, part of England, which is agreeable to the diuision aforesaid, being in deed as in the land continuall without separation of the sea, so also by homage and fealtie vnto the same, as by particular declarations shall most manifestlie appere, by the testimonie of such as haue left writing for prooue and confirmation thereof.

In which matter, passing the death of king Humbar, the acts of Dunwald king of this realme of England, the diuision of Beline and Bren two brethren, the victories of king Arthur; we shall begin at the yeere of our Lord, nine hundred, which is six hundred fortie two yeeres past, a time of sufficient antiquitie, from which we shall make speciall declaration and euident prooue of the erection of our right and title of superiortie euer more continued and preferred hitherto. Edward the first, before the conquest, sonne to Alured king of England, had vnder his dominion and obedience the king of Scots. And here is to be noted, that this matter was so notorious and manifest, as Marian a Scot, writing that storie in those daies, granteth, confesseth, & testifieth the same: and this dominion continued in that state three and twenty yeeres.

At which time Athelstane succeeded in the crowne of England, and hauing by battell conquered Scotland, he made one Constantine king of that partie, to rule and gouerne the countrie of Scotland vnder him, adding this princelie word, that it was more honorable to him to make a king, than to be a king.

 Twentie foure yeres after that, which was the yere of our Lord 947, king Edward our progenitor Athel-stanes brother, toke homage of Trise then king of Scots. Thirtie yeres after that, which was in the yere of our Lord 977, king Edgar our predecessour toke homage of Rinald king of Scots. Here was a litle trouble in England by the death of saint Edward king and martyr, destroyed by the deceit of his mother in law. But yet within memorie, fortie yeres after the homage done by Rinald to king Edgar, that is to say, in the yere of our Lord 1018, Mal-colme king of Scots did homage to Knute our pre-decessour.

After this homage done, the Scots uttered some peere of their naturall disposition: whereupon, by warre made by our progenitor saint Edward the confessor, twentie nine yeres after homage done, that is to say, the yere of our Lord 1056, Malcolme king of Scots was vanquished, and the realme gi-uen to Malcolme his sonne, by our said progenitor saint Edward: to whome the said Malcolme made homage and fealtie, within eleuen yeres after that William Conqueror entered this realme, whereof he accounted no perfect conquest, untill he had likewise subdued the Scots. And therefore in the said yere, which was in the yere of our Lord 1068, the said Malcolme king of Scots did homage to the said William Conqueror, as his superior by conquest king of England. Twentie five yeres after that, which was in the yere of our Lord 1092, the said Malcolme did homage and fealtie to William Rufus, sonne to the said William Conqueror: and yet after that was for his offenses and demerits deposed, and his sonne substitute in his place, who likewise failed of his dutie: and therefore was ordeined in that estate (by the said William Rufus) Edgar, brother to the last Malcolme, and sonne to the first, who did homage and fealtie accordinglie.

Seven yeres after, that was in the yere of our Lord 1100, the said Edgar R. of Scots did homage unto Henrie the first our progenitor. Thirtie seauen yeres after that, David king of Scots did homage to Mathild the emperesse, as daughter and heire to Henrie the first. Wherefore, being after required by Stephan, then obtaining possession of the realme, to make his homage; he refused so to do, because he had before made it to the said Mathild, and thereupon forbare. After which Davids death, which ensued shortly after, the sonne of the said David made homage to the said king Stephan. Fouretene yeres after that, which was in the yere of our Lord, a thousand one hundred and fiftie, William king of Scots, and Da-uid his brother, with all the nobles of Scotland, made homage to Henrie the seconds sonne, with a reservation of their dutie to Henrie the second his father. Twentie five yeres after, which was in the yere of our Lord 1175, William king of Scotland, after much rebellion & resistance, according to their naturall inclination, king Henrie the second then being in Normandie, William then king of Scots knowledged finally his error, and made his peace and composition, confirmed with his great seale, and the seales of the nobilitie of Scotland, making therewith his homage and fealtie.

Within fiftene yeres after that, which was the yere of our Lord 1190, the said William king of Scots came to our citie of Canturburie, and there did homage to our noble progenitor king Richard the first. Fouretene yeres after that, the said William did homage to our progenitor king John, upon a hill besides Lincolne, making his oth upon the crosse of Hubert then archbishop of Canturburie, being there present, a marvellous multitude assembled for that purpose. Twentie six yeres after that, which was in the yere of our Lord 1216, Alexander king of Scots married Margaret, the daughter of our progenitor Henrie the third, at our citie of Pothe, in the feast of Christmasse, at which time the said Alexander did his homage to our said progenitor, who reigned in this realme fiftie six yeres. And therefore betwene the homage made by the said Alexander king of Scots, and the homage done by Alexander, sonne to the said king of Scots, to Edward the first at his coronation at Westminster, there was about fiftie yeres: at which time the said Alexander king of Scots repaired to the said feast of coronation, and there did his dutie, as is aforesaid. Within twentie eight yeres after that, which was in the yere of our Lord 1282, John Balioll king of Scots made his homage and fealtie to the said king Edward the first our progenitor.

After this began Robert Bruce to usurpe the crowne of Scotland, and to moue sedition therfore against them of the house of Balioll, which made for a season some interruption in the said homage; but yet no intermission without the termes of memorie: for within fortie foure yeres after, which was the yere of our Lord 1326, Edward Balioll after a great victorie had in Scotland against the other faction, and intoting the crowne of Scotland, made homage to our progenitor Edward the third. And twentie yeres after that, which was in the yere of our Lord 1346, David Bruce, who was ever in the contrarie faction, did neuertheless in the title of the crowne of Scotland, whereof he was then in possession, make homage to our said progenitor Edward the third.

Within nine yeres after this, Edward the third, to chastise the infidelitie of the Scots, made warre against them: when after great victories, Edward Balioll, hauing the iust and right title to the realme of Scotland, surrendered clearlie the same to our said progenitor, at the towne of Norburgh in Scotland, where our said progenitor accepted the same, and then caused himselfe to be crowned king of Scotland, and for a time interteined it, and inioied it, as verie proprietarie and owner of the realme: as on the one part by confiscation acquitted, and on the other part by free will surrendered vnto him. And then after the death of our said progenitor Edward the third, began seditions and insurrections in this our realme, in the time of our progenitor Richard the second, which was augmented by the alteration of the state of the said Richard, and the deuolution of the same to Henrie the fourth: so as the Scots had some leasure to plaie their vagues, and follow their accustomed manner. And yet Henrie the fift, for recourie of his right in France, commanded the king of Scots to attend vpon him in that iourneie.

In this time, the realme of Scotland being descended to the house of the Stewards, of which our nephue directlie commeth: James Steward king of Scots, in the yere of our Lord 1423, made homage to Henrie the first at Windsoze, which homage was distant from the time of the other homage made by David Bruce, thre score yeres and more, but farre within the fresh memorie of man. All which homages and fealties as they appere by storie to haue bene made and done at times and seasons as afoze, so do there remaine instruments made thereupon, and sealed with the seales of the kings of Scotland, testifieng the same. And yet doth it appere by storie, how the Scots practised to steale out of our treasure di-uerse of these instruments, which neuertheless were afterward recovered againe.

And to the intent ye may know of what forme and tenure the said instruments be, here is inserted the the effect in word and sentence as they be made, which we do, to meet with the cauillation and contriued euasion of the Scots, alleging the homage to haue bene made for the earledome of Huntingdon, which is as true as the allegation of him that is burnt in the hand, to say he was cut with a sickle. And therefore the tenure of the homage is this.

The forme of the homage.

Iohn R. king of Scots shall be true and faithfull vnto you lord Edward by the grace of God R. of England, the noble & superiour lord of the kingdome of Scotland, as vnto you I make my fidelitie of the same kingdome of Scotland, the which I hold & claime to hold of you. And I shall beare to you my faith and fidelitie of life and lim, and worldlie honoz, against all men; and faithfullie I shall knowlege, and shall do to you seruice due to you of the kingdome of Scotland aforesaid: as God so helpe and these holie euangelists.

Now for the third part, touching records and registers, we haue them so formall, so autenticall, so seriously handled, and with such circumstances declaring the matters, as they be and ought to be a great corroboration of that hath bene in stories written & reported in this matter. For among other things we haue the solempne act and iudiciall processe of our progenitor Edward the first, in discussion of the title of Scotland, when the same was challenged by competitors (that is to saie) Florentius comes of Holandie, Patricius de Dunbar comes de Perthia, Willielmus de Wesci, Willielmus de Rosse, Robertus de Winkent, Nicholaus de Soules, Patricius Galightlie, Rogerus de Mundeville, Joannes de Comin, D. Joannes de Hastings, Joannes de Balliolo, Robertus de Bzuse, Ericus rex Norwegie.

Finallie, after a great consultation and mature deliberation, with discussion of the allegations proponed on all parts, sentence was giuen for the title of Ballioll, according wherevnto he intioed the realme. But for confirmation of the dutie of the homage before that time obserued by the R. of Scots, it appeareth in those records, how when those competitors of the realme of Scotland repaired to our progenitor, as to the chiefe lord for discussion of the same, inasmuch as the authoritie of the iudgement to be giuen depended thereupon; it was then ordered that the whole parlement of Scotland, spirituall & temporall, & of all degrees assembled for that purpose, and considering vpon what ground & foundation the kings of Scotland had in times past made the said homages and recognition of superiourtie, the said parlement finding the same good & true, should (if they so deemed it) yeeld and giue place, and by expresse content recognise the same.

At which parlement was alleged vnto them, as appeareth in the same records, not onelie these acts of the princes before those daies, and before rehearsed: but also besides the testimonie of stories, the writings and letters of forren princes at that time reciting and rehearsing the same. Wherevpon the said parlement did there agree to this our superiourtie, and insuing their determination did particularlie and seuerallie make homage & fealtie with proclamation, that whosoever withdrew himselfe from doing his dutie therein, should be reputed as a rebell. And so all made homage and fealtie to our progenitor Edward the first. And the realme of Scotland was in the time of the discussion of the title ruled by gardians deputed by him. All castels and holds were surrendred to him, as to the superiour lord in the time of vacation. Benefices, offices, fees, promotions passed in that time from the mere gift of our said progenitor, as in the right of this crowne of England. Sherriffes named and appointed, writs, and precepts made, obeted, and executed.

Finallie, all that we do now in the duchie of Lancaster, the same did our progenitor for the time of the contention for that title in the realme of Scotland, by the consent of an agreement of all estates of the realme assembled and consulted with for that purpose. At which time the bishops of saint Andrews and Glasgow were not (as they now be) archbishops; but recognised the archbishop of Dorkie, which extended ouer all that countrie. Now if the Scots will take exception to the homage of their princes as made in warre, and by force, which is not true; what will they say, or can they for shame allege against their owne parlement, not of some but of all confirmed, & testified by their writings and seales; wherevnto nothing inforced them but right and reason, being passed in peace and quiet without armor & compulsion: If they say they did it not, they speake like themselves; if they say they did it, then do they now like themselves, to withdraw their dutie, not so much to be blamed, as to be amended.

Thus appeareth vnto you the beginning of the right of superiourtie, with a perpetuall continuance, without intermission within memorie. Certaine commissions and forbearings vpon the grounds and occasions before specified we denie not, whereby they haue manie times sought and taken their opportunities to withdraw the doing of their dutie in knowledge of our superiourtie ouer them; which to auoid, they haue not cared what they said or alleged, though it were neuer so vntrue, lieng alwaies in wait when they might annoie this realme, not without their owne great danger & perill, & also erreame detriment. But as they detracted the doing of their dutie, so God granted vnto this realme force to compell them thereto within memorie, and notwithstanding anie their interruption by resistance, which vnto the time of our progenitor Henrie the first neuer endured so long as it made intermission within time of mind, whereby the possession might seeme to be empaiued. From the time of Henrie the first, vnto the seventh yeare of our reigne, our realme hath bene for a season lacerat and torne by diuersitie of titles, till our time; and since also by warre outwardlie bared and troubled. The storie is so lamentable for some part therof, as were too tedious to rehearse.

Since the death of our progenitor Henrie the first, our grandfather Edward the fourth reigned, who after great trauels to attaine quietnes in his realme, finallie in the time of preparation of warre against Scotland died. Richard the third, then usurped for a small time in peaces, whome the king our father by the strength of Gods hand overthrew in battell, and most iustlie attained the possession of this realme, who neuertheless, after the great tempestuous stormes, finding all matters not yet brought to perfect quiet and rest, ceased and forbore to require of the Scots to do their dutie; thinking it policie rather for that time to assate to fame their nature by pleasant confunction & conuersation of amicitie, than to charge them with their fault, & require dutie of them, when oportunitie serued not by force & feare to constrain and compell them. And thus passed ouer the reigne of our father without demand of this homage. And being our reigne now foure and thirtie yeares, we were one and twentie yeares letted by our nephew his minoritie, being then more careful how to bring him out of danger, to the place of a king, than to receive of him homage; when he had full possession of the same.

Wherefore being now passed, since the last homage made by the king of Scots, to our progenitor Henrie the first, 122 yeares, at which time the homage was done at Windsor by James Steward, then king of Scots, as before 56 of these yeares the crowne of this realme was in contention, the trouble wherof ingendred also some businesse in the time of the king our father; which was three and thirtie yeares: and in our time one and twentieth yeares hath passed in the minority of our nephew. So as finally, the Scots resorting to their onelie defense of continuance of possession, can onelie allege iustitie but 13 yeares of silence in the time of our reigne, being all the other times since the homage done by James Steward, such as the silence in them (had they bene neuer so long) could not haue ingendred prejudice to the losse of anie right that may yet be declared and proued due. For what can be imputed to king Edward for not demanding homage being in strife for that estate, wherunto the homage was due? What should Richard the third searce for homage in Scotland, that had neither right ne leasure to haue homage done vnto him in England? Who can blame our father, knowing the Scots nature neuer to do their dutie but for feare; if he demanded not that of them, which they would eschew if they might, seeing his realme not clearelie then purged from ill seed of sedition, sparkled and scattered in the cruell ciuill warres before.

Law and reason serueth, that the passing ouer of time not commodious, that the purpose is not allowable in prescription for the losse of anie right. And the minority of the king of Scots hath indured twentieth one yeeres of our reigne, which being an impediment on their part, the whole prescription of the Scots, if the matter were prescriptible, is thus deduced euidentlie to thirtene yeere, which thirtene yeere without excuse we haue ceased and forborne to demand our dutie, like as the Scots haue likewise ceased to offer and render the same: for which cause neuertheless we do not enter this warre, ne minded to demand anie such matter now, being rather desirous to reioice and take comfort in the friendship of our nephew as our neighbour, than to moue matter vnto him of displeasure, whereby to alienate such naturall inclination of loue as he should haue towards vs: but such be the works of God superior ouer all, to suffer occasions to be ministred, whereby due superiority may be knowne, demanded, and required, to the intent that according thereto all things gouerned in due order here, we may to his pleasure passe ouer this life to his honor and glorie, which he grant vs to doe in such rest, peace, and tranquillitie, as shall be meet and conuenient for vs.

When therefore the king of England had set forth this declaration of the causes that moued him to make warre against Scotland, he prepared to prosecute the same both by sea and land, and hauing rigged and furnished diuerse ships of warre, he sent the same forth to the sea, that they might take such Scottish ships as were to returne from their voyages made into France, Flanders, Denmarke, and other countries, whether they were gone for trade of merchandise, with which the English ships incountred, took 28 of the principall ships of all Scotland, fraught with all kind of merchandise and rich wares, which they brought with them into the English ports.

proclaimed: but the king of England thought it no reason to depart with them so soone, till other articles of agreement might be concluded, and therefore refused not onelie to deliuer their ships, but also sent sir Robert Bowes with men to the borders, giuing him in charge to invade Scotland, who according to his commission, with three thousand men rode into Scotland, and began to burne and to spoile certeine small townes: whereupon the fraic being raised in the countie, George Gordon the earle of Huntley, who was appointed to remaine as lieutenant vpon the borders, for doubt of such sudden inuasions, immediately gathered a number of borderers, and set vpon the Englishmen, and put them all to flight: sir Robert Bowes, and his brother Richard Bowes, with diuers other, to the number of six hundred, were taken prisoners; and the said sir Robert Bowes and other the principall landed men were kept still in Scotland till after the kings death. This victorie chanced to the Scots, at a place called Walden Rig in the Pers, vpon saint Bartholomewes day, which is the twentieth fourth of August.

After this, the king of England sent the duke of Norfolk with the earles of Shrewesburie, Darbie, Cumberland, Surreie, Hertford, Angus, Rutland, and the lords of the north parts of England, with an armie of fortie thousand men, as the Scots esteemed them, though they were not manie aboute twentieth thousand, who entered into Scotland the one and twentieth of October, and burnt certeine townes vpon the side of the water of Tweed: but the earle of Huntley, hauing with him ten thousand of the borderers and other, so waited vpon them, giuing them now and then skirmishes and alarms, that they came not past two miles from the water of Tweed within the Scottish bounds at that season.

In the meane time, the king of Scotland being aduertised hereof, gathered a great armie through all the parts of his realme, and came to Sowtraie hedge, where they mustered, and were numbred to be thirtie six thousand men, with the which he came to Falla Mure, and there incamped, determining to giue battell to the Englishmen, as he pretended: howbeit, if the duke had taried longer, as it was thought he would haue done, if the time of the yeere and provision of vittels had serued, the Scots would yet haue bene better aduised, before they had joined with him in a pight field. But true it is, that after the duke had remained there so long as vittels might be had and recovered from anie part, he retired with his armie backe into England, not without some losse of men, horses, and spoiles, which the Scots vnder the earle of Huntley and others tooke from the Englishmen in that their retire, speciallie as they passed ouer the riuer of Tweed.

After the Englishmen were thus departed and withdrawne home forth of Scotland, king James being of an high and manlie courage, in reuenge of harmes done by the Englishmen within his countie, thought good that his whole armie should passe forward and invade England, himselfe to go there with in proper person. And herein he requested the consent of his nobilitie, who after long reasoning, and good aduise ment taken in the matter, gaue answer [by the earle of Murray] to the king in this sort, that they could not thinke it good that they should passe within England, and to seeke battell, the king himselfe being with them, considering that his two sons were lately deceased, so that he had no succession of his bodie: for in case that they lost the field, as in chance of battell is most uncerteine, then the king of England hauing great substance, might therewith follow the victorie, and put the realme of Scotland in great hazard.

Therefore they thought it sufficient to defend their owne bounds, and to confine the enemies for feare to leave the invasion thereof, as presentlie they had done; and declared that they were determined to have given battell to their enemies, if they had continued within the realme, and doubted not by the helpe of God, they having so iust a cause; and being invincible in their countrey, but that they should have obtained the victorie. The king hearing these determinations, albeit his high courage pressed him to invade; yet the approved wit of his nobles and counsellors persuaded him to follow their advice, and so returned with his army backe againe, the first of November, the army of England being first discharged, and the onlie of Northfolke in his returne towards London.

Shortlie after, the king of Scotland went himselfe in person to the west marches of his realme, where the lord Marwell was warden, whome together with the earles of Caillies, and Glencarne [the lord Fleming] and certeine other lords there with him, the king appointed to invade the English marches on that side, taking with them the power of the borders, and sent also with them Oliver Sinclair, the brother of Roseline Comarck, and the residue of the gentlemen of his household. These earles and lords entering into England on saint Bartholmes euen, being the foure and twentieth of November, began to burne certeine towines upon the water of Esk. But as soone as the scire was raised in the countrey, the lord Cherton warden of the west marches of England, suddenly raised the power of the countrey, and came to a little hill, where they shewed themselves in sight unto the Scottish armie.

The Scottish lords perceiving the Englishmen gathered, assembled themselves together, and inquired who was lieutenant generall there by the kings appointment; and incontinentlie Oliver Sinclair was holden by on two mens shoulders, where he shewed forth the kings commission, instituting him lieutenant to the king of that armie. But howsoever that was read, the earles and lords there present, thought themselves imbolded too much, to have such a meane gentleman advanced in authoritie above them all, and therefore determined not to fight under such a capteine, but willinglie suffered themselves to be overcome, and so were taken by the Englishmen, not shewing anie countenance of defense to the contrarie, and without slaughter of anie one person on either side.

This rode was called Solowate Spolse, at the which were taken prisoners men of name, these persons following: the earle of Caillies and Glencarne, the lord Marwell, the lord Fleming, the lord Somerville, the lord Oliphant, Oliver Sinclair, the lord of Craggie, and sundrie other gentlemen, the which were led prisoners to London, where they remained till after the king was dead. The king being in Carlauerocke upon the borders not farre from Solowate Spolse, when this misfortune fell upon his men: after he heard thereof, he was meruelouslie amazed, the more, in calling to remembrance the refusall made by his nobles, assembled with him in campe at Falla upon his request to invade England. Where with such an impression entered his mind, that he thought with himselfe that all his whole nobilitie had conspired against him, and thereupon took such a vehement and high displeasure, increased with a melancholious thought, that he departed suddenly from thence to Edinburgh, and after removed to Falkeland, where he remained as a man desolate of comfort, being soe bereft in spirit and bodie, and would not permit anie manner of person to have access to him, his secret & familiar servants onelie excepted. Soe, as he was thus disquieted, newes were brought him that the quene his wife was brought to bed of a faire young princeesse the seventh day of December, the which newes he liked verie euill; and added the griefe thereof to his former displeasure, insomuch that he perceived the end of his life to approach, and withall said, that he foresaw great trouble to come upon the realme of Scotland, for the pur suit which the king of England was like to make thereupon against the same, to the end he might bring it under his subiection, either by marriage, or by some other meane. It was reported that he was disquieted with some unkindlie medicine: but howsoever the matter was, he yielded up his spirit to almighty God, and departed this world the fourteenth of December, in the yere of our redemption, 1542, the thirtieth yere of his age, and thirftie two of his reigne.

Shortlie after his departure, his bodie was conveyed into Falkeland unto Edinburgh in most honorable wise, the cardinall, the earles of Arrant, Argyle, Rothes, Marshall, and diuerse other noblemen being present, and with all funerall pompe (as was requisite) was buried in the abbeye church of Holyrood house, beside the bodie of quene Margarete, daughter to the king of France, his first wife. There was great lamentation and moene made for his death throughout all parts of his realme, for he was verie well belovied among his subjects. He was of sweet countenance and courteous speech, greatly esteemed, having a diuine mind in all whatsoeuer, neither certeine in doubtful things, nor doubtful in things of certentie, auoiding dangers with graue counsels, performing hard matters with great nobilitie of mind, and foreseeing what might follow with an incredible iudgement: in such sort that he was neuer bnprouided against the danger of anie thing, or was dyatone from it by the difficultie thereof, or was hindered by the obscuritie therein; where by he might incur the note either of a rash, fearefull, or slow person.

All which singular commendations seemed to flow out of this spring, that he did not by heat of youth (rashlie) but with great deliberation (soundlie) manage the whole affaires of the common-wealth, for as he did chieflie labor that his table might not exceed for gluttonie, nor be ouersparring for miserie: so if his apparell were decent, he esteemed not the shew of womanish attire after the courtlie fashion. He was so farre from pride, that he alwaies shewed himselfe offended with the bles thereof. He was an obseruer of iustice, a defender of the law, and a sharpe shield for the innocent and poore: for which cause he was of the nobilitie called the king of the commoners. For he set at libertie the poore oppressed with the tyrannie of the rich, and repressed the rich from spoiling of the poore: all which he did with a certeine severity, but yet such, as in the same there appeared a wonderful gentleness of his naturall disposition, because he seldom put anie of them to death, but did either by prison or milt punish the offense. For he was wont to say, that he would neuer take life from anie, but onelie to keepe the law sound, and for the example of others: and to keepe downe the boldnesse of such as dwelt about the borders. With these conditions he left the realme plentifully furnished with riches, and his owne treasure not emptie, but abundantly stored with gold, silver and other furniture: for which cause it should not seeme strange, that his death was greatlie lamented of his subjects, to whom he was a perfect patrone, and a louing father.

Of whome also Buchanan lib. 14 testifieth, that his vices did almost equall all his great vertues; but that they were rather to be imputed to the iniquitie of the time than the inclination of his nature, for the libertie of althings had then dissolved the public discipline, which could not be staied but by great severitie of correction. And this made him more covetous of monie, because that he was kept extreme hard when he was under the government of others. Whereby, when he came to be at libertie, he was a new to furnish all his courts with household stuffe, finding his houses empty, and all things consumed awaie: for his tutors had consumed the kinglie patrimonie upon those whome he willingly would not to have received it. Besides, for his excesse of women the fault grew by such as were his tutors, who gave him libertie thereto, supposing thereby to keepe him the longer in their danger. The nobilitie did not greatly take his death grievouslie, because he had fined manie, imprisoned more, and caused no small few (for avoiding his displeasure) to die into England, and rather to commit themselves to the enemy than to his anger.)

1543 Lelle. Fr.Thin.

The eternall God calling to his mercie James king of Scotland, the first of that name; Marie his onelie daughter and heire began his reigne over the realme of Scotland, the eighteenth day of December, in the yere of our Lord 1542. Francis the first of that name then reigning in France, & Henrie the eight over the Englishmen. She was not passing seven daies old when his father departing this life, left unto him his kingdome, his mother lieng in childbed in the castell of Lithquo, of which place the lord Levingston being capteine, had the charge committed to him, both of the daughter & mother, with the mothers good agreement and free consent.

Howsoever, immediatlie after the kings death (because he deceased without making anie will, or taking anie direction for the gouvernement either of the realme, or custodie of the yong queene his daughter) David Beton, cardinall and archbishop of S. Andrews, the speciall minister & factor of the French causes, to the advancement and continuance thereof, invented and forged [by Henrie Balfoure] a will and testament of the late king now departed, in which (amongst other things) he established himselfe chiefe regent, adjoining with him the earles of Murray, base brother to the king deceased, Huntleie and Argile, not once mentioning the earle of Lennox then absent in France, nor yet James Hamilton earle of Arrane his cousine, being there present in Scotland,

Those that professed the reformed religion, being then called protestants, to whome the said cardinall was ever a cruell enemy and sharpe scourge, espied forth his uniuersall dealing in this behalfe, and trusting by the gentle nature and good inclination of the said earle of Arrane, to haue some libertie to embrace the gospell, set him against the cardinall: so that by the helpe of his owne and their friends, he removed the cardinall and his adherents from the usurped roome and authoritie, and therewith was the said earle of Arrane proclaimed gouernour and protector of the realme. [And thereupon shewing his authoritie, he entereth the kings palaces, as saith Lelleus lib. 10. pa. 464. and beth the kings treasure, and calleth the officers of the treasure to account, whereof he reteineth some, and changeth others at his pleasure.]

This earle of Arrane made a title to haue and inioie that office and roome, as next in blood to the yong queene, as descended from a sister of H. James the third, married to his grandfather lord Hamilton. In the yere 1475, by reason of which marriage he was created earle of Arrane, as by act of parlement holden the same yere at Edinburgh, it was agreed and ordeined. The king of England that noble prince Henrie the eight, aduertised of the death of the king of Scots, considered with good aduise, that now there was offered a most readie means and iust occasion, whereby the two realmes of England and Scotland might be brought into one entier monarchie, without warre or bloodshed, by the marriage of his sonne prince Edward, being then little past six yeres of age, with the yong queene of Scotland.

The king of England being resolved fullie to bring the same to passe, either by quiet means or by force, and sending for the earles of Castile, and Glencarne, the lords Sparrowell, and Flenning, and other prisoners that had bene taken at Soloway mosse, caused them to be conueied unto Hampton court; where the seuen and twentieth of December they being right curiously intertained, he made unto them an overture of his purpose and whole intent, proponing the whole matter unto them, requesting them for their parts, to helpe (with their consents) that a contract of marriage might be made betwene his sonne the prince, and the yong queene, promising to them libertie without ransome, besides other pleasures and benefits, if they would do their indue to persuade the gouernour, and other the nobilitie of Scotland to be agreeable hereto.

The Scottish earles and lords accepted the kings offer, and withall promised to do their diligence to persuade the rest of the nobilitie in Scotland at their coming home: whereupon they were licenced to depart, and so coming to Newcastle, remained there with the duke of Suffolke, then the kings lieutenant of the north parts, till he had received forth of Scotland certeine pledges of the chiefe of these lords, for performance of their promises. Likewise the king of England sent with them the earle of Angus, and his brother sir George Dowglas with his letters to the gouernour, requesting effectuouslie, that they might be restored to their roomes, lands and possessions in that realme.

These lords arriving at Edinburgh, about the midd of Januarie, declared to the gouernour their message and proposition made by the king of England, with such efficacie, that the gouernour being persuaded thereto by their words, sent for the lords and nobilitie of the realme to come to Edinburgh, to a convention there, to be holden the seven and twentieth of that present moneth: where they concluded that a parlement should be kept in March next ensuing. And doubting lest the cardinall (being there present) should go about to persuade the nobilitie not to consent to their desires, they caused him to be put in ward within the castell of Dalketh: the lord Seton being appointed to haue the custodie of him. About the same time, sir Robert Bowes, and all other the Englishmen that were prisoners, and had bene taken at Halbing rig on saint Bartholomewes day (as before ye haue heard) were sent home by the gouernour into England, and sir Rafe Sadler was sent ambassadour from king Henrie unto the said gouernour, and other the lords of Scotland, and came thither before the said parlement, to persuade the lords to agree unto the king his masters motions, travelling so diligentlie in the matters whereabout he was thus sent, that it was concluded by act of parlement, to send ambassadoys into England, for the better satisfaction of king Henries desires.

And so the earle of Glencarne, sir George Dowglas, sir William Hamilton, sir James Leirmouth, and the secretarie being named and appointed thereto, departed in the moneth of March, and coming into England unto the king, remained there till the latter end of Aprile. In which meane time, such covenants, contracts, and promises were had and concluded, passed and sealed interchangeablie, as stood with the pleasure and good liking of king Henrie, so as the marriage marriage was fullie contracted, and a peace concluded for ten yeres, by authoritie of the aforesaid parliament. Wherewith also the lord gouernour shewed himselfe to imbrace the reformed religion, causing one frier Guilliam to preach against images, and fruitlesse ceremonies, and gaue libertie that the bible called The new and old testament, should be had in English, & vniuersallie published through the realme of Scotland.

Also he commanded not onelie the cardinall (as befoze ye haue heard) but also ordeined that the queene mother should remaine in Lithgow with the yong queene hir daughter, vnder some manner of safe custodie, and the cardinall to be removed vnto his owne castell of saint Andzeuoes, with warders about him to see him safelie kept. * Not long after, the cardinall was restored to vnhoped libertie, and the earle of Angus, George Douglasse, and the lord James, the heire of James Hamilton, with manie others, by the consent of the three estates, were wholie restored to all their goods, and deliuered from the sentence of banishment.

John Hamilton abbat of Passelet, brother of the gouernour, returning out of France (where he had imployed himselfe to studie) did (with certeine learned men, as Dauid Pantier, and others, whom he had in his companie) visit the king of England, of whome they were most courtesilie interteined. After which this Hamilton returning into Scotland, was made treasurer of the kingdome, which office he discharged with great commendation, so long as his brother kept the gouernement, whom he did not onelie helpe in counsell for ordering of the kingdome, but also shewed him selfe a ballant and industrious man in the warres against the English, for defense of the kingdome of Scotland. About this time, the earle Bothwell, which was banished, and had remained long at Venice, did returne into Scotland, whither he was honozable welcommed, as a person much desired of his friends and kindred.)

The realme being thus brought in quiet, and vnder good gouernement, the French king soze mistaking this new coniunction of the Scots with England, and doubting least the old former bond of alliance betwixt France and Scotland might thereby be utterly dissolued and shaken off, he sent for Mattheu Steward earle of Lennox, then abroad in his seruice in the wars of Italie, and vpon his comming backe from thence to the court, he declared to him the decrease of the late king of Scots, the intrusion of Arrane, and the attempts in that realme begun, with all the circumstances from point to point as he knew; and further discoursed with him what wrong he had to be set aside, and displaced from his right of gouernement; and therefore exhorted him to repaire home to recover the same, offering not onelie to assist him with men, monie, and munition, but also to ioine his friends in Scotland with him in aid to attaine the place of regiment, and to remove Arrane and others from it.

The earle of Lennox herebpon with commission and instructions deliuered to him by the French king, had also letters from him directed to the lords that were of the French faction, wherein the said king requested them to remaine and continue in their former good meanings towards him, and to assist the earle of Lennox in all things, as should be thought expedient. * Now, befoze the earle of Lennox returned out of France, the cardinall had vsed manie persuasions against the English, as well that the Scots set at libertie by the king, should breake their faith with him, as also to draw them to the French faction, and rather to suffer their pledges to receiue what king Henrie would vse vnto them, than by kee-

Wherebpon, when the greater part of those nobles (whome the matter touched, could easilie find anie coloz for the excuse of their fault) had consented to the cardinals persuasion, onelie one amongst the rest would not yeld thereto, which was Gilbert Kennedy earle of Cassiles, who could not be drawn from that constancie (in obseruing his faith) either by bribes, flatteries, or threats. For he (hauing two brothers pledges for him in England) did openlie protest, that he would returne to prison, and by no feare laid befoze him commit such a fault, as that he would redeme his life with the blood of his two brothers: for which cause he went forthwith to London, although euerie man spake against it. Wherebpon, the king of England did singularlie commend the constancie of the yong man, and further (to the end that his vertue might be knotone to all men) did set him at libertie with his two brethren, and sent him home honozable rewarded.

Now the realme of Scotland being thus in great byroz by means of the queenes and cardinals factions, whereof the last drew all (such as he could) to support the French league, they sent ambassadors into France, to request the French king to send home Mattheu Steward earle of Lennox, as one that was not onelie emulous against Hamilton, but also his deadlie enimie for the slaughter of his father at Linnmoch: which yong Steward (beside his beautie and comelinsse of bodie, in the vertie flower of his youth; the memorie, carefulnesse, and dangers of his father, a verie popular man, and beloued of the people; the worthinesse of that familie brought almost to an end, and that the same was of great power, and linked in marriage with manie nobles) did win and draw the minds of manie men, desirous to helpe him, for the great fauor they bare vnto him.

To the which further procurement of the peoples loue also, there might be soined, that he was next heire to the crowne by the kings appointment, if he died without issue male; the which king James, if he had liued, would haue established by parlement: besides which likewise, there wanted not flatterers, which did not onelie stirre by his noble mind (now gaping after great things, and vndefended against deceits) to the hope of gouerning of the kingdome for these one and twentie yeres and moze, during the queenes minozitie, and to the rule and power ouer his enimies, whereby he might vse reuenge vpon them: but also they promised him to marrie the queene Dowager: and in the meane time (if anie thing happened otherwise than well to the yong queene) that he should obtaine the crowne, whereby he should both be king, and the next lawfull heire of James Hamilton latelie deceased, since the gouernour was a bastard, and could not onelie by law not loke or hope for the kingdome, but also not so much as hope to be heire to his owne familie. To all which were added the persuasions of the French befoze mentioned. Wherebpon, the yong man (whose mind was credulous, being tickled and intised with these hopes) determined to go into Scotland.)

The earle therefore fullie instructed by the French king, how to deale and proceed, toke his leaue, and with all speed taking the sea, directed his course into Scotland, where (after his arriuall) he came to Edinburgh, in which towne all the lords being assembled together with the gouernour, he declared to them the effect of his commission from the French king, his request to them, & good affection to mainteine them against England, if in case they would continue the old league with him, and not seeke to make anie new alliance with the king of England.

But perceiuing that the gouernor and his friends were minded to satisfie the king of Englands desires, he would not farrie for a resolute answer, but by the counsell of the earle of Argyle, William earle of Glencarne, and others of the French faction, he suddenly departed forth of Edinburgh toward the west countrie, highly displeased (as should seme) with the gouernor, and taking Lithgow in his way, he conferred with the quene Dowager (as they termed hir) deuising how to assemble the noble men of the French side, to bring hir and hir daughter to libertie, out of the danger of the lord gouernor: because it was supposed that he ment to conuie hir into England.

About the same time, through practise of the abbat of Dalkeith, brother to the gouernor, and others, the castell of Edinburgh was got out of the hands of sir Peter Creighton, and the keeping thereof committed by the gouernors appointment vnto James Hamilton lord of Stanehouse. But the erle of Lennor, with the assistance of the earles of Huntly, Montrose, Pentife, Argyle, and others of the French faction in August following, conuicted the young quene with hir mother from Lithgow vnto Strueling. The cardinall also was there with them latelie before, hauing corrupted his keepers, & gotten abroad at libertie. Here with was a day appointed and proclaimed for the coronation of the young quene. The earle of Arrane then gouernor, with the earles of Angus, Castles, the lords Marwell, Somerville, and diuerse others, called the English lords, remaining still at Edinburgh, aduertised the king of England of all the doings of Lennor, and other of that faction, requirring his aduise and counsell how to deale for disappointing of their purposes, that sought to continue the amitie still with France, to the preiudice of peace with England.

The king of England aduertised hereof, as well thus from the gouernor, and other the Scottish lords, as also from sir Rafe Sadler, his maiesties ambassador there, doubted greatly least these lords, in whose hands the quene then was, in respect of the fauour which they bare to the French king, should conuie hir ouer into France: whereupon he requested the gouernor, and the other lords that fauoured his side, so to deale, that she might be sent into England, there to remaine, till the marriage might be consummate betwixt hir and his sonne prince Edward: hauing in the meane time such lords of hir countrie about hir to attend vpon hir, and to see to hir bringing vp, as should be thought expedient. To conclude, his maiestie not onelie sent his princelie comfort by waie of counsell and good aduise, but also according to their desire, and as by the duke of Suffolke (his highnes lieutenant then in the north) it was thought expedient.

Thomas lord Wharton, with two thousand men from the west marches, and the lord Guers with other two thousand from the east borders, were appointed to enter Scotland, and to ioint themselves with the gouernor, and his friends, to assist them against their aduersaries. But as they were in readiness to march, through the secret labor of the cardinall, wishing the aduancement of the earle of Arrane his kinsman (whome he thought he should well enough frame to be at his appointment) rather than Lennor that was knowne to be of a greater stomach, the matter was so handled, that by the cardinall and the earle of Huntlye of the one part, and the quene Dowager on the other, that the earle of Arrane reuolting from the king of England, came in to the Dowager, and iointed himselfe with the cardinall, and other the lords of the French faction: by reason whereof, they all concluded to mainteine him in the estate of lord gouernor, and not to place Lennor, as their purpose was to haue done, if Arrane had continued faithfull to the king of England.

Shortlie after, the young quene was crowned at Striueling, the cardinall taking vpon him to order things as he thought good, appointing the gouernor to beare the crowne as chiefe person, & next in bloud to the quene, and the earle of Lennor to beare the scepter. After the coronation, a parliament was called and holden at Edinburgh, at the which, in presence of the patriarchy of Apuleia the popes agent, and of the French kings ambassadores, monsieur la Brosse, and monsieur Penage, latelie before come into the realme, the earle of Arrane was newlie confirmed gouernor. And for the sure preservation (as they pretended) of the young quene, it was agreed by the gouernor and the estates, that she should remaine with the old quene hir mother in Sterling castell, during hir minority, and certeine rents of that seignorie were assigned for maintenance of such traine as was thought expedient to be attendant about hir: and further, the lords Levingston, Erskin, and Fleming (as saith Buchanan) the lord Grams, John Arskine, John Lindesay, & William Levingston were appointed to abide continualie with hir, for the better safeguard of hir person.

Thus was euerie thing ordered as seemed to stand with the pleasure of the cardinall. Whereupon the earle of Lennor, perceiuing how vncourteouslie he was vsed, to haue his aduersarie thus confirmed in authoritie by the French side, and himselfe reiecte, he first sent to the French king, informing him thoroughly of the iniuries to him done, putting him in remembrance of the promises made to him when he departed from him; also the constantnesse of his seruice, the hazard he had put himselfe in for his sake; and notwithstanding how he was yet vnkinde dealt with, that through trust of his promised aid and assistance, he was brought out of credit in his countrie, and subiecte vnder the commandement and authoritie of his enimie, and wrongfullie disappointed of his right, which he looked to haue recovered, and to haue bene mainteined therein by his support.

In consideration whereof, he renounced his seruice, willing him from thenceforth not to looke for the same any more at his hands. Here with Lennor iointing himselfe with the earles of Angus, Castles, and Glencarne, the lords Marwell, and Somerville, the shiriffe of Ayr, the lord of Dumlanrig, and other of that side, called the English lords, set himselfe against the gouernor, the cardinall, and others of that faction, so that the residue of this yere was spent in ciuill dissention betwixt them. And here is to be noted, that a little before that the earle of Arrane reuolted to the French part, there was arrived in the mouth of the river of Cleide on the west coast, five ships, which the French king had sent to the aid of his friends in Scotland, vnder the conduction of James Stewart of Cardonold, and of the forenamed monsieur de la Brosse, & monsieur Penage, the French kings ambassadores.

There came with them also the patriarchy of Apuleia, of whome ye haue likewise heard before. They had brought aboard in these ships fiftie thousand crownes, and munition to the value of ten thousand crownes. The earle of Lennor therfore, when he first resolved to turne to the English part, with the aduise of his confederats, seized vpon those ships, got the fiftie thousand crownes, and the most part of the munition into his hands, and brought it to the castell of Dunbretton, reteining it to his owne vse, where it was sent to haue bene imployed to the maintenance of the French faction, against the king of England, and the lords that leaned to his side.

The earle of Lennor therefore, raising a power of men of warre with the assistance of the lords of his faction, came with them vnto Lethagatist the gouernor that was then in Edinburgh: but through the diligent trauell of the cardinall, the earles of Huntley, Murray, and Argyle, the matter was taken by, and an appointment accorded: so that sir George Dowglas was deliuered as a pledge for his brother the earle of Angus, the maister of Glencarne for his father the earle of Glencarne, the abbat Cassaghole for his brother the earle of Castles, to remaine in safe keeping where it pleased the gouernor to appoint. The earle of Lennor came vnto Edinburgh to the gouernor, but within six daies after, they went both to Lithuho, from whence the earle of Lennor secretly departed from the gouernor without bidding him farewell, and comming to Glasgow, fortified the castell.

When the gouernor had receiued true intelligence that the earle had taken Glasgow, he assembling such power as he could make, as well of his friends and followers, as of others, especially of the lord Boid went vnto Glasgow, in which place the earle of Glencarne had before placed his armie, to the end there to trie the matter with his enemies. But before the battell the earle of Lennor had withdrawn himselfe vnto Dunbretton, to gather a greater assemblie, thortlie after to retorne to Glasgow. The earle of Glencarne, with Tilbarne, Housstone, Buchanan, Macfarlane, Drumquhassile, and other barons and nobles of the Lennor, Hamfrie, and other places adioining, with the citizens, ecclesiasticall persons of all orders, and the other sort of common people, departed out of the towne to the plaine thereof (being a mile from the towne) there to trie the event of battell (before the comming of the earle of Lennor) more in haste than good speed. Whereupon the gouernor (perceiuing himselfe to be drawne forward to battell) commanded the trumpets to sound to the alarmes. Whereupon the battels ioined, the hostes began to fight violently, and the conflict grew to be extreme on both parts: in which (with great slaughter) they long time fought with vncertaine victorie.

But in the end (what with the force of his armie, and the encouragement of the capteine) the full conquest fell to the gouernor, who put his enemies to flight. At what time, of the fauourers of the Lennor there were manie slaine, partlie of the nobles (as the sonne of the earle of Glencarne, and Monnepennie capteine of the footmen) and partlie of the common sort (as the citizens of Glasgow, and manie ecclesiasticall persons.) Besides all which, there had manie more perished, if the gouernor (through his naturall clemencie) had not (when the victorie began to leane towards him) giuen a signe of retreat, & with much speed saued manie of them. On the gouernors part were few missing, except Cambusketh (the head of that familie) and the baron of Argentine. The gouernor pursuing this victorie, entered the towne of Glasgow, where he vsed (by the persuation of the lord Boid) wonderfull fauour towards the citizens, (farre beyond their deserts) although that he deputed some (of the chiefest condition amongst them) from all the use and benefit of their goods.

The earle of Lennor remaining at Dunbar, receiued into the castell the earle of Glencarne, and others, which had escaped the battell, who sometime after did rest (being feared with the ouerthrow) from a nie further turmoiles or troubles. But in the end, they which fauoured the Lennor, do afresh stirre him to take weapon against the gouernor: whereupon he doth restrengthen the towne and steeple of Glasgow, determining to gather a new supplie, and once more to cast the dice of war. But the gouernor (indring to prevent all his indeuour by swift counsell) did (being accompanied with the cardinall) call to him about Glasgow, all the nobles of the south parts, and (bringing forth the hired souldiers) commanded the great peeces to be planted against the citie. Whereupon (entering the towne) he besieged the castell and steeple of the church (in which place were both Scots and Frenchmen) and in the end (after a slaughter of some of them) enforced the other to yield their forts. After that the castell was thus comitted to the gouernors hands, he hanged eightene of the chiefest and best loued vnto Lennor, and permitted the rest to depart at libertie. The earle of Lennor (vnderstanding that his affaires began to waver, and to obtaine such euill successe) doth send the earle of Angus and the lord Marwell to the gouernor, to treat of peace betwene him and the earle of Lennor, the which they laboured with great diligence, according to the trust reposed in them.

But the gouernor caused them both to be secretly conueied from the counsell by the backside of the blacke friers of Glasgow, vnto the castell of Hamilton, and from thence the earle was sent to Blackenese. The lord Marwell was kept still in hold at Hamilton, and George Dowglas, and the maister of Glencarne in Edinburgh castell. These persons thus imprisoned stood in great doubt of their liues (as some supposed:) but as diuerse other did suspect, they were rather committed for a colour, than for a nie euill that was meant towards them. Howsoeuer it was with them, the earle of Lennor by the aduise of his friends sent the earle of Glencarne, and a gentleman called Thomas Bishop, vnto the king of England with offer of his seruice, and request to haue in marriage the ladie Margaret Dowglas daughter to the Earle of Angus, and neece to the said king.

Herevnto the king granted, for the performance whereof (and the dispatch of other things) he sent the lord Wharton and diuerse others. And on the earles part, the bishop of Cathnes his brother and the earle of Glencarne were appointed, who met at Carleill to performe the agreement. The quene, the cardinall, and the other of the French faction, did helpe the gouernor all they might, with counsell, power, and monie; because they perceiued that he repented such friendship with England as he had taken in hand by the counsell of Angus and of others. In the meane time there was a parlement assembled at Striueling, in which by common consent, the earle of Lennor was condemned of treason: wherefore the sentence of banishment was executed against him, and all his goods with his patrimonie were confiscat to the quene. Whilst the French king was ascertained that Lennor had forsaken his faction, & committed himselfe to the king of England, he suddenlie committed to prison John Stewart lord of Aubigne baron in France, brother to the earle of Lennor, and deputed the said John Stewart of all such honors and offices as he possessed in France. For he was generall capteine of all the Scottish lands in France, being either such as had gard of the kings bodie, or bowmen, or men at armes: for the king of France hath Scots in wages of all the orders.

But let vs now returne to the Patriarch, who was honorablie receiued by the cardinall and the bishop of Scotland into the citie of Glasgow: during whose abode there, great contention arose betwene the cardinall and the archbishop of Glasgow, who should in that citie be of greatest authoritie and honor. Which in the end came to this issue, that both families fell together by the eares, which of them should go before foze with his crosse bozne byright. For the cardinall archbishop of saint Andzeus and primat of the kingdome, did affirme that the archbishop of Glasgou should not haue his crosse bozne in his owne church, so long as the cardinall was present. Which the seruants of the archbishop of Glasgou toke in such disdain, that they plucked downe the cardinals crosse and threwe it to the ground. Whereupon, the gouernor (vnderstanding the whole matter, and that it was now come from wordes to swordes) made hast to appease this factious commotion, & caused the Patriarch therewith to be brought to Edeburgh accompanied with the clergie, where he remained all the winter following. In which towne he was honozable entertained and feasted of the quene, the gouernor, and other of the nobles, whome he requited with the like courtesie.

Amongest these of the nobilitie, the earle of Murray had the Patriarch on a day to a banquet, in which this Murray did shew an honozable thing not accustomed amongest others. For where he abounded in store of silver vessels, yet he commanded his seruants to furnish a great cupbord with christall glasses brought from Venice, & that in the midst of dinner he should ouerturne the cupbord as it were unwillinglie. Which the servant at the time appointed did performe. The noise of breaking of which glasses did suddenly fill the eares of all the companie: and the Patriarch seeing the hurt, was somewhat moued. But the earle making no account of this thing, commanded his man astrictly to furnish the same cupbord with as manie and fairer vessels of glasse than the former were, to the Patriarchs great admiration. For the Patriarch affirmed that the glasses of Murraue and Venice did not anie way excell these. Cruellie this earle of Murray was honozable, wise, iust, and famous amongest manie princes for his manifold vertues, & manie ambassages most happilie performed amongest them. Who shortly after this, departing the court, died of the stone at his castle in Turnwaite.

This Patriarch shewed to the gouernor (besides other priuileges that he had from the see of Rome) his great authoritie, in that he was legat from the popes side, amongest the Scots, as long as he remained there. Which office, when he departed to Rome, he procured to be transferred to the cardinall; at what time the Patriarch also in the name of the pope, did promise much helpe, and monie to be sent to Scotland against England. For he studied by all means he could, to hinder the marriage of those two kingdoms: because he suspected thereby, that some alteration might be made in Scotland touching the religion; with the ouerthrow of churches and monasteries. Now, after that the Patriarch had remained all the winter in Scotland, he departed from thence in March, who as he was honozable entertained in all places, so he spared not to recount to the French king and other princes (whome he visited in his iournie) the humanitie he found in Scotland, which he also imparted to the bishop of Rome, to the other cardinals, & to the senat of Venice; not without singular praise and honoz to the Scottish nation.

They that were sent, so solicited the earles cause, that in the end the king was perswaded that Lennor ought of right to haue the gouernement of the realme of Scotland, and to be second person in the same. And herewith, in consideration how vnjustlie not onelie his maiestie had bene dealt with, but also how vnthankfullie and discourteouslie Lennor had bene used, both at the hands of the French king, and also of his adherents in Scotland, by the cardinall & others: he both thankfullie receiued his gentle offer of seruice, & also promised to aid him in his title and all other lawfull causes: and herewith prepared an armie to passe into Scotland by sea, appointing the earle of Hertford, and the lord Lile to haue the conduction of the same, who shipping at Tinnmouth with their people, arrived in the Forth vnder Werdie castell, a mile & a halfe above Leith the third of Maie, the whole nauie containing aboue the number of two hundred ships. Here at Newhauen, a quarter of a mile from the said castell, they landed their armie of ten thousand men of warre, with great artillerie, and all kind of munition.

The lord gouernor being at that present within the towne of Edeburgh, hearing of their arriual, went forth of the towne accompanied with the cardinall, the earles of Huntlee, Argile, Bothwell, and others, purposing to stop their landing: but perceiving the puissance of the aduersaries to be such, as they could not resist the same, they returned to Edeburgh againe, and sent maister Adam Ottenbozne prouost of Edeburgh, and two of the bailiffs to the earle of Hertford, to vnderstand the cause of his coming; and withall offered, that if there were anie iniuries or wrongs done by anie of the Scots nation, he would appoint commissioners to talke with such as by him should be authorized thereto, for the full answering thereof, & to that effect he would gladlie receiue them into the towne of Edeburgh.

The earle of Hertford answered that he had no commission to talke of anie such matter; but rather to take reuenge of the vnjust dealing and breach of promise on those that had falsified their faith. And therefore minding to burne the towne of Edeburgh, as well as other within that realme, he willed the inhabitants and all all those that were within the same to come forth, and submit themselves before him the kings lieutenant, to stand vnto the kings will and pleasure, or else he would not faile to proceed in execution thereof. The prouost answered that he would rather abide all extremities, than accomplish his request and desire in that behalfe; and thereupon returned to the towne.

After the gouernor had heard what answer was made to the prouost, he caused the castell to be furnished with all things necessarie for defense, and departed straightwaies to Striueling. The English armie lodging that night in Leith, marched the next day toward Edeburgh, passing by the Cannogat street to enter at the nether bow, where they found some resistance made by the Scots, so that diuerse were slaine on both parts. Towards night, the Englishmen, after they had continued long in skirmishing that day with the Scottishmen, retired to Leith. The next day the whole armie with the great artillerie came forward towards the towne, and breaking open the Cannogat, they entered the towne by the same, bringing their ordinance within sight of the castell, purposing to plant the same in batteries against it; but the capteine of the castell caused the artillerie within to shoot off at them in so great abundance, & so good measure, that they slue diuerse Englishmen, and dismounted one of their peeces, so that in the end they were constrained to draw backe their ordinance & retired; but yet in the meane time they set fire on the towne, and burnt the most part of all the houses in the same. They burnt also the Cannogat street, and the abbey of Holie rood house. The gouernor at that present released out of prison the earle of Angus, the lord Marwell, the maister of Glencarne, sir George Dowglas, and others.

In this meane time also there came from the borders by land foure thousand of English horsemen, vnder the conduction of the lord William Cuiers, and his sonne sir Rafe Cuiers; who joining with the armie at Leith, scowred the countrie on euery rie side of Edinburgh. Finallie, after the English armie had lien in Leith a certeine space, they burnt that towne also, and sent their ships awate fraught with pillage and spoiles (got as well in that towne, as in Edinburgh, and abroad in the countrie) backe towards England. And therewith the earle of Hertford, the lord admerall, and others, returned by land through the countrie vnto Berwick, as in the English historie more at large appeareth. Whilest the English armie was thus occupied in that part of Scotland, the erle of Lennor with an armie of men which he had raised, was readie to come on the backs of the gouernor and his adherents, if they had assembled their forces and come forward to haue giuen the Englishmen battell. For all this season the ciuill contentions still continued, and sundrie conflicts and skirmishes chanced betwixt the parties.

* The Scots which inhabit the mountains, and the Isles, did now in these turmoiles begin to shew some tokens of their inconstancie. For they (which paid pærelie tribute in the time of James the first, kept the peace, liued within the bounds of law, and well obeyed the gouernor) did now (after they saw all things on a flame) begin againe to spoile and destroye their neighbors, in the same uttering the humors of their naturall disposition. Whereupon the gouernor (to restraine their boldnesse) called vnto him George Gordon earle of Huntley, and the earle of Argyle, whereof he made the one gouernor of the north parts of Scotland, of the Orkades, and Shetland; and to the other, he committed the rule of Argyle, and the Isles Hebrides. Whereupon Huntley with all speed gathered an armie from the north parts, and determined to byrde the Glencamerons, the Genconelles, the Mudiardes, & the Kindiardes, with force and authoritie. The capteins or heads of which families, were Ewin Allanson, Ronald Mac-koneilglas, and John Mudiard, who did possesse the lands of the lords Grant, and Louet, hauing expelled them by force from the same.

But when they first vnderstood that Huntley had incamped nere vnto them, they fled euerie one home to their owne possessions: which being defended partly by the west sea, and partly included about with the mounteins, stopped Huntley, so that he might not haue anie passage vnto them: by meanes whereof (these disseisors being banished) the lords Grant and Louet were restored to their right inheritance. But it fell out contrarie for Louet, who going to take his owne into his hands, fell into danger of his enemies. For at that time both the companies were disposed into such order, that neither partie could absteine from fight. Whereupon they first discharge their bodies one against another, and their arrowes spent, they after flie to their swords, with which they fought so egerlie, that the night cutting off the battell, it could not be well knowne to which part the victorie gaue place. In which there was so great slaughter on both parts, that till the next morning in viewing the dead bodies, the victors were not knowne. Amongest whome of the part of the Glencamerons and Mudiardes there were manie slaine.

But by reason of the death of the lord Louet, and of his sonne and heire (a youth of singular hope, and brought vp in France) with three hundred of the bloud and surname of the Fraisers (for Louet was the head and leader of that familie) the hurt seemed to be the greater on their part. For there was a rumor spread, that there was not one of the familie of the Fraisers left aliuie that was of mans state. But it happened by the singular benefit of God, that they left their wiues with child when they went to the fight, by which meanes the familie was after raised and restored. Huntley (greatlie grieved that the Fraisers had receiued this grievous wound) gathered a power together, and with armes so pursued those factious people, that he took and beheaded Ewin Allanson, and Ronald; with diuerse others, and put the rest in prison. The earle of Argyle discharged the office committed to him as well as Huntley did and with more happie successe, for all the Island men humbly submitted themselves vnto him; and delivered pledges to liue quietlie hereafter.)

About this time the earle of Lennor, accompanied with Alexander the maister of Glencarne, or therwise called lord of Kilmaise, Walter Graham brother to the earle of Montrose, sir John Borthwick knight, and sundrie other gentlemen, took the sea to passe into England, and arriued at Wexhamster about Midsummer: & passing from thence to the court, he was iustly receiued. And immediately thereupon was the mariage celebrated betwixt him and the ladie Margaret Douglas, daughter & heire to the earle of Angus, and to Margaret his wife queene of Scots, sister to king Henrie the eight, at what time there was assured to him by way of inheritance, lands to the value of seuen hundred marks of pærelie rent of assise, in consideration of this mariage with the kings nece, and in recompense of lands lost by him in France, to the which he was inheritor after the deceasse of Robert Stewart lord Dbenie, one of the foure marshals of France.

Wherupon, king Henrie being now upon his iourne towards Bullongne, as well for the auoiance of his highnesse enemies in Scotland, as for recouerie of the said earles right in that realme, appointed the said erle to enter Scotland in the moneth of August, accompanied with sir Rife Mansfield, sir Peter Hewitt knights, maister Thomas Audleie, maister Thomas Wokes, old maister Winter comptrolor of the kings ships, and his sonne sir William Winter that now is, and sundrie other capteins, hauing vnder their charge two hundred hackbutters, two hundred archers with long bowes, and two hundred armed pikes, beside the mariners belonging to those ships that were appointed to go forth on this iourne, being in number about twelue or fourteen saile, belonging to Wiffow, and other of the west parts.

Upon their arrivall on the coast of Scotland, they burnt the Ile of Arrane, and rased the gouernors castle there to the ground. And afterwards arriuing at the Ile of Bute, they entered the same, and took the castell of Koseie standing therein (from whence the Stewards kings of Scotland had their originall) the capteine they had a while prisoner with them into England. Here also they took two French ships laden with wines, and this done they entered the firth of Clyde, thinking to find none but their friends in the castell of Dunbretton. But true it is, that in this meane time the earle of Glencarne with sundrie gentlemen being left in that castell, with the capteine thereof called Houson, to keepe it in the name and to the behoofe of the erle of Lennor, were in his absence persuaded thorough practise of the queene Dolmager, not only to renounce their promised faith to him, in defrauding him of that castell; but also to intrap and wind him within their danger to take him prisoner.

For this purpose they so dissembled the matter, that they had got him on land onelie with three hundred men: and so farre forth they were growne in talke, that the erle of Lennor being entered into the castell with a few other with him, the monie was laid downe on the board, to be paid to the capteine for his satisfaction. But in the meane time, the earle of Lennor, & such as were with him, perceiving some treasonable treasonable practise in hand, got forth of the house againe vnto their companie below, leauing the monie behind them, and after made shift to get to their ships, and not before it was high time.

For if they had staied that night, they had bene intrapped by George Douglas, who with foure thousand men was secretlie drawne thitherwards, and entered the towne of Dunzetton, shortly after that the earle of Lennox was thus departed, and got to his ships lieng there at hand in the riuer of Clide, downe the which he retired to the sea, not without danger to haue lost the same ships, by reason of the narrownesse of the water: for the erle of Argile being gotten betwixt him and the sea with a great power of men, with banners displayed, hailed the ships with shot of ordinance from the castell of Dinnune, annoieng the earle of Lennox his passage as much as he could. But he escaping with the English gentlemen, and the ships out of danger, toke aduise together at the Ile of Bute what they were best to do.

The earle soze moued to haue bene thus repelled from Dunzetton, and stomaching the matter soze, to be so discountenanced by his enimie the earle of Argile, with the aduise of the English gentlemen, he returned with them, and with great thew of manhood toke land beside the castell and towne of Dinnune, where the earle of Argile with seuen hundred men was readie to incounter him, & to keepe him off from landing: but by the helpe of the shot out of the ships, and great sroze of botes, the Englishmen landed, slue foure scoze of the enimies, most part gentlemen, and put the residue to flight, with the losse of thre men onlie on the English side.

This done, the towne of Dinnune was burnt, and the church spoiled, that was full of goods and ornaments. When the night approached, by reason the Englishmen had no powder, nor other prouision on land, the earle with his people returned to shipboard in safetie, howbeit not without offer of skirmish made by the enimies though to their losse, namelie of those that aduanced themselves most forward. About foure or fve daies after, the earle of Lennox with fve hundred men landed in another part of Argile, and remaining on land a whole day together, burnt, spoiled, and wasted the countrie: the earle of Argile with two thousand men giuing the looking on, and not once offering the skirmish, so that the earle of Lennox with his souldiers retired to his ships without incounter.

After this they invaded the Ile of Bute, where James Mackonell dwelled, burnt manie places in that countrie, toke and caried awaie great boties of cattell and other goods. All the coasts of Kile, Carrike, & Coningham, and likewise of Galloway remained in continuall feare, so that oftentimes their beacons were fired, and manie of the noble men constrained to come to the earle of Lennox, suing to him for assurance. In these exploitess the earle had with him Walter Macferlane of Tirbat, and seuen scoze men of the head of Lennox, that spake both Irish, English, & the Scottish twongs, light footmen, well armed in shirts of male, with bowes, and two handed swords, and being ioined with the English archers and shot, did much available scrvice in the stretts, the marishes, and mountaine countries.

* During these things, they which had gouernment of the Scottish affairs (as the quene dowager, the cardinall, and the gouernor) called a councell, in which they decreed that all such of the nobilitie as had force and armoz, should be readie to follow the gouernor whither soeuer he went, and there to remaine with him for the space of eight daies. Shortly lie after there assembled eight thousand men, and in the sharpe winter battered the church of Colbington, standing in armoz a whole day and night to the great toile and wearinesse of the men and horses. The next day the gouernor, either to accuse his tenderesse susteined in the last daies laboz of warre, or else fearing the inuasion of the enimie (for he was certified of an armie of men that should come from Bertwike) suddenlie (vknownte to the other nobilitie) did sie to Dunbar with a few of his owne traine. They which went about to excuse the defame of this flight, reported how he feared that he should haue bene betrayed to the English by his host, for hatred which they had conceiued against him for manie of his offenses.

This departure of the gouernor brought great trouble to the armie, & so much the more, because the secreter it was (and the reason vknownte) the more cause it gaue to the rest to feare some further euill. Wherefore the greater part remained in this obstinate mind, that euerie one should returne the next way home, and leaue the artillerie at randon. But others (who were more carefull, and would seme lesse fearefull) do agre to stufte the peces full of powder, and to breake them, rather than they should fall in the hands & helpe of the enimie. To the which deuise onelie Archembald Douglas did resist, least he should ad a wicked deed to a wicked flight. When he could not staie any man, either by threat, in treatie, or authoritie, he exclaimed with a lowd voice (for euerie one to heare him) that for his owne part he had rather die an honest death, than to haue a feare cure and rich life with such dishonor. Wherefore you my friends consider what you will do, for either I will bzing awaie this artillerie, or I will not returne home with life; wherefore I meane to make this the last end both of my life and glorie. When he had spoken this, a few (whose honor was deare vnto them) were moued therewith, but the rest (despairing by reason of the shamefull flight of the gouernor) did scatteringlie depart, wandring whither they thought good, without anie order. The Douglasse with such companie as he had (placed in god order) followed the artillerie, and brought the same to Dunbar, the horsemen of his enimies in vaine hastening after them behind at their backes. This expedition by the gouernor rashlie begun, and shamefullie performed, brake the hearts of the Scots, and aduanced the minds of the English, who gloriouse applied the dauidnesse of the gouernor to their owne glorie.)

To conclude, after the earle of Lennox and his companie had atchiued these enterprises afore mentioned, he returned towards England, and sent sir Peter Helwates knight, & Thomas Bishop a Scottish gentleman, to aduertise the king of England of his proceedings, who found him at the siege of Bullongne, where they declared to him the whole circumstance of euerie thing, as the same had passed in the earles soznie, which the king toke in verie god part. And vpon his returne into England, after the conquest of Bullongne, the earle of Lennox was also called home to the court by letters to him directed, he being then at Bristow.

About the middelt of Februarie, sir Rafe Eure commonlie called Euers, lord warden of the English middle marches, entred Scotland with a power of foure thousand Englishmen, Irishmen, and assured Scots, and comming first vnto Jedworth, lodged there that night. And therewithall vnderstanding that the gouernor and the earle of Angus were at the abbeye of Melros, about eight miles distant from thence, the next morning he was got forth so earlie, that he was almost vpon the enimies in such wisse on the sudden, that they fled out of their lodgings, and and left their beds and all their household furniture which they had in store there with them, not having time to conuie it awaie at their departure; their warning was so short. Sir Rafe Cuers at his coming thither, finding them fled and gone, spoiled the towne and abbete, utterly defacing the townes and monuments of the earles of Douglas; greatlie to the displeasure of the earle of Angus; and those of his linage.

* After this (the coming of the English being looked for the next yeere) the minds of the borderers were greatlie troubled, because they were hopelesse to attaine anie succor from the gouernor, which used the aduise of the clergie, but chieflie of the cardinall. Whereupon Archembald Douglas earle of Angus (greatlie moued partlie with his priuat losses, for he had great possessions in the marches, and in Linot, and partlie to see his ancestors monuments defaced) came to the gouernor, and fullie laid before him the greatnesse of the danger wherein the realme did stand, perswading him to encounter and resist the same. At what time also (after the gouernour had opened vnto him, that he was forsaken of the nobilitie, and now left alone) the Douglas shewed that the same happened vnto him by his owne fault, and not by the nobilitie, which would implete their liues, linings, and goods, for the defense of the common-wealth. For he contemning their counsell, onlie leaned to the spiritualtie, who were cowards in warre, and seditious in peace.

Out of this founteine (saith he) a suspicion (that you dare not trust one another) is growne betwene you and them, which is the onelie cause why things are no better perfozmed. But if you determine (in great affaires) to take the aduise of them (who will not refuse to spend their blood therein) I doubt not but that we shall be able to execute as great matters as euer our ancestors did: but if we shall (by our slouth) permit the enemie to take all things from vs, then of necessitie will follow, that either they shall shortly banish vs, or bring vs into perpetuall seruitude: the inconueniences of anie of which cannot well be spoken. As touching our selues I know that thou art suspected to be a coward, and I a traitor, which reproch if thou thinke to purge (for thou canst not auoid it) prepare to cleare the same, not with painted speeches, but with bloudie weapons.)

Whereupon the gouernor and the said earle (soe aggrieved to be thus foiled at the Englishmens hands) assembled together [vnder the leading of Porman Lesle son of the earle of Rossfele] all such forces as they might recouer, so that they had quicklie got them about fixtene hundred men, whereof eight hundred at the least were gentlemen. Who hearing that the Englishmen were retiring towards Jedworth, they met them at a place called Pannier hugh, or Womehouse, where both the parties alighting on foot, ment to trie the quarell by plaine force of hand. But as they were redy to ioine, the assured Scots, to the number of seven or eight hundred resolted vnto the part of their countreimen, by reason whereof, after a right sharpe and fierce conflict, the Englishmen in the end were constrained to flie, whome the Scots right egerlie pursued, slue sir Rafe Cuers, the lord Ogile, sir Brian Leiton, and other gentlemen & souldiours to the number of eight hundred. They toke also about two thousand prisoners, with certeine peeces of artillerie and other munition.

This victorie fell to the Scots the seventeenth day of Februarie, the report whereof was right displeasing to the English nation, but speciallie the losse of that worthy gentleman sir Rafe Cuers was greatlie bemoined, and that euen of the king himselfe, for the noble prowesse and great loialtie which at all times had bene found in him. His seruice had bene such in these wars against Scotland, that he had brought the more part of the Scots within twentie miles space of the English borders, vnto the obedience of the king of England, although at length they holpe to worke his confusion, as before we haue heard. ¶ Of this gentleman & his singular seruice in the field, I omit here to speake, because he was imployed otherwise, besides Scotland: wherefore I remit the readers to the twentieth yeere of king Henrie the eight, where to his high commendation this gentleman is recorded.]

* The occasion of the English ouerthrow (as saith Lesleus) and the Scots victorie, were chieflie by these meanes. First they fought vpon equal ground, and with vnequall helpe. For the Scots with the sunne on their backs (being declined toward setting) came forth of a narrow & marshy place, and set vpon the English (at the side of an hill which was betwene them) hauing the sun in their faces, by which meanes they could neither well perceiue what number the Scots had, nor with their gunnes hurt anie of the Scots. But those that fought in the first battell, whereunto was ioined (a feare not in vaine) which they had conceived of the Scottish march-men, who in great number hauing red crosses (the note of the English) ran vp and downe hither and thither to see the euent thereof.)

About the same time that the victorie before mentioned chanced to the Scots, Robert Corncoise bishop of Ross departed this life, to whome succeeded David Pantane, secretaire to the gouernor, and prior of Saint Marie Ile. In Aprill, William Steward bishop of Aberdeen likewise deceased, and maister William Gordon chancelor of Purteie, vncle to George erle of Huntley, was by the cardinals sute promoted to that see, greatlie to the displeasure of the earle of Angus, that labored to haue preferred an other thereto. For this and other causes, the cardinall was greatlie in hatred of the Douglasles.

* About that time, the king of England by pisse & pries perswaded the Flemings to take fixtene of our ships harbozed in the haven, and to conuert the commodities (therewith they were fraught, being verie costlie) to their owne commoditie. By means whereof at one time we had warres with two nations, England and Flanders. But sith the Flemings did not the same maliciously for hatred to the Scots, but carefullie for the loue vnto the English, as the Scots did certeinlie know, they shewed none other token of enimitie to the Flemings, but that they forbade them to fish on their coasts, and did sometimes intercept their ships, without further iniurie done vnto them.)

This yeere also, Montgomerie, other wise called monsieur de Loges, knight of the order of saint Michaele, was sent by the French king with foure thousand Frenchmen into Scotland to assist the Scots against England. He landed at Dunbretton, & came in good order to Edinburgh the thirtenth of Maie: he brought with him from the French king the order of saint Michaele, to inuest therewith the lord gouernor, the earles of Angus, Huntley, and Argile. Herewith also was an armie of Scots raised, and ioining with the Frenchmen, they approached the borders, where they laie for a season: but the earle of Hertford lieutenant generall of the north parts coming downe, toke such direction for the safe keeping of the English borders, that after the Scots had laine there in campe a certeine space without atchiuing anie great enterprisse, though some notable exploit was looked for to haue bene attempted by them at that present, they brake vp their armie & went home.

* This castell of Dunbretton was at that time so carefullie kept by the captein therof, that he determined neither to deliuer it to the gouernor, nor to anie Englishman, nor to anie Scot. Whereupon, the gouernor fearing least it should fall into the hands of the English, prepare to besiege the same; the newes wherof comming to Glencarne, he signified the same vnto Lennor, affirming, that if he would come thither, he should shortly obtaine the castell. The king of England reioicing of that newes, prepareth two ships, and in the meane time sent the bishop of Cathnesse into Scotland, which should forthwith be receiued into the castell. Therefore the gouernor making the more hast, commeth to Dunbretton together with the cardinall, and the earles Huntley, and Argyle, laing present siege to the same, which was stronglie done, and the castilains pressed to great extremitie by the slaughter of manie people. But at length by the policie of the earle Huntley, it was to agreed, that the castell (which was by nature inerpugnabile) should be deliuered. Which the gouernor receiued (with certeine conditions) and honorable intreated the captein for the singular discharge of the trust committed to him: and therewithall he restored the bishop of Cathnesse, brother to the earle of Lennor to his bishoprike, which before he had lost by his going into England.)

The sixteenth of September, thre or foure hundred Scots, with Marwell, Lochinuart, and Johnstone, aided with the Frenchmen, attempted to enter into England on the east borders: but the Englishmen perceiuing where they were about to passe by a certeine freit, they set vpon them with their archers, discomfited them, sleaing, & taking to the number of seuen score of them. Among other that were taken, one of the sonnes to the lord Hume, with a French capteine, and George Elphinston archer of the corps to the French king, were accounted chiefe. Also on the west borders, Robert Marwell eldest son to the lord Marwell, was taken in a robe made by him and others, into the English confines on that side, although at an other time certeine Englishmen making a robe into Scotland were distressed, the more part of them being taken or slaine. At a parliament holden at Linlithquho, begun there the twentieth eight of September, and continued till the first of October, Mattheu earle of Lennor, and Thomas bishop of Abeltree, were forsailed, and all their lands and goods giuen auaie and annered to the crowne.

In this meane time, the king of England desirous to haue the seruice of the Isles of Scotland for sundrie great causes and respects, moued the earle Lennor to deale with them to that end: which he did. And his trauell toke such effect, that the Island men were contented to rest at the king of England his deuotion, partly for that they were in a manner sworne enemies to the earle of Argyle, and his familie; and partly for that they doubted the king of Englands puissance, if he should attempt to inuade those parties: and againe, bearing an old speciall fauour to the earle of Lennor and his house, hauing an ancient bond of alliance and amitie with the same, they were the more readie to satisfie his motion. Whereupon, they elected amongst them a lord of the Isles, the next of blood: a title long since verie odious to the state of Scotland, and by the inducement of the earle of Lennor, he was contented as the king of Englands pensioner, to receiue two thousand crownes of him yearly, with certeine rich apparell of cloth of gold and siluer from the said earle.

The first proofe he attempted to shew of his seruice in the king of Englands behalfe, was this. Hauing instructions thereto from the earle of Lennor, vnder colour of conference for matters touching the estate of the countrie, he had suborned one of his alliance and seruants, called the clane Reginald, to intrap the earles of Argyle and Huntley. And although they escaped verie narrowly, the lord Hume an ancient baron, & great friend to those two earles, was slaine by the said clane, together with seuen hundred of his kinsmen and friends; insomuch that there remained not but one young boy of that linage to succeed in that lords lands [which is before more fullie handled out of Lefleus.] After this, the lord of the Isles, with six thousand men imbarked in certeine vessels, passed over into Carrick, harried and burnt the lands of the earle of Castles, then a great enemy to the king of England. In this voiage he got great spoiles, and slew manie of the enemies. After which enterprise so achieved, he came with his power by sea, and landed in Ireland, where the earles of Lennor and Desmond were, with twelue hundred Irishmen, appointed to loins with him, that with their whole power they might inuade the earle of Argyles countries, & consequently the maine land of Scotland at the broad side. But before the preparation could be made ready for that iorney, the new lord of the Isles deceased, whose buriall in Ireland to honor the earle of Lennor, had the king of England in four hundred pounds sterling.

But now to returne vnto the doings on the borders betwixt England and Scotland in this season. We shall vnderstand, that after the armie of Scotland was broken by the earle of Hertford by vertue of his commission, raised an armie in the countries of the further side of Trent northwards; so that when the same was assembled together, with such strangers as were then in the kings wages, they were in all of horsemen and footmen twelue thousand fighting men. With this armie garded with great store of artillerie, munition, and all manner of furniture necessarie, the earle of Hertford entered Scotland, and marching to Coldingham, pass by the water of Tweed, and burnt a great part of the Pers, and Tuitale, the abbeies of Kelso, Melrose, Dryburgh, and Jedworth; with towines & villages, to the number of fise score.

Howbeit, he entered not farre within the said countrie beyond the said water, but kept alongest nere to the same, and returned backe without anie encounter: for after the Scottish armie was broken by it, it was not like they would assemble againe, and so the earle of Hertford taking the time that serued his purpose, soe indamaged the Scottish borders at that present. Manie other small inuasions were made, as well by the one part as the other, and some skirmishes fell out betwixt them, sometime to the losse of the Scottish, and sometime of the English, according to the course of warre.

* Nuch about this time, or rather before, Robert Marwell, the sonne of Robert (a young man of singular vertue) was taken by the English. Besides which there was nothing done worthy the memorie, but that in the beginning of the next winter Montgomerie returned into France. After this, the cardinall leadeth the gouernor about the nere countries, vnder colour to reconcile such parts as were at dissention: then they came first to Perth, where foure men were punished for eating flesh on forbidden daies: from thence they went to Dundee, called Loadune (to vse the name of the place, as Buchanan hath) to punish (as they said) such as vsed the late new testament of Luthers translation. Whither came also Patrike Greie (the head of a noble familie in those parts) accompanied with a good traine, together with the erle of Rothseis, being before that commanded to be there by the gouernor, after the pacifying of the other ther tumults. But the cardinall (supposing it small safetie to receiue at one time two such noble and facious persons addited to the restored religion, into the towne) wrought with the gouernour that he and they might go backe to Perth.

The next morning, when those two noblemen (redie for the iourneie) vnderstood that the gouernour was on his waie towards Perth, they presentlie followed him. Who being come in sight, did strike such feare into the cardinall, that the gouernour commanded them to sunder themselves, and seuerallie to enter the citie: which they did. Whereupon the next day they were both committed to prison. But Kothleise being shortly deliuered, Greie (whome they hated more, and feared most) was kept longer in that restraint. But before they parted thence, it seemed good to the cardinall to abate the strength of Ruthwen capteine of the towne. For which cause, the gouernour taketh his office from him, and bestoweth the same vpon Kinsane Comarch, neighbor and kinsman to Greie. For this Ruthwen was a great enimie to the cardinall, and much fauored the restored religion: as likewise was Greie, who after the same sort did not beare a friendlie mind to the cardinall, nor to his religion.

By reason thereof, the cardinall supposed, that if he might set them (by this meanes) together by the eares (sith manie of both parts would soine for defense of the chiefe of their families) and that if anie side had the worse (as both must be diminished) that then he had by so much abated the power of one of his enimies. Upon which occasion the gouernment of Perth (which had by manie descents remained in the familie of the Ruthwens) might be thus translated to Kinsane. Thus the new capteine was sent with a power to subdue the citizens by force, if they would not willingly obey: as it seemed that they would not; because they took it with some griefe, to haue (in this new capteine) the old libertie of voices (in choosing of their gouernour) taken from them. The besieging of the towne being therefore diuided into parts, Greie (which had whole taken the matter on him) attempted the ouerthrow thereof, from the bridge of Tait. The other band (hauing laid their artillerie along by the riuer ouer against the towne) did invade the open side of the said Perth.

But because the swelling of the sea did not answer their deuise, they came not in time to do anie thing therein. Greie assailing it by the bridge (which Ruthwen hauing receiued, and conueied the aid into the next houses, would seeme to leaue vngarded) when he saw no armed men stirring, did (without all feare) enter further into the towne, where he was so sharplie set vpon by Ruthwen, and his companie (suddenlie and vnlooked for breaking out of the houses vpon them) that euerie one hastened to spie some place by which he might flee awaie. But the multitude confused and diuened into a streit, did let one an other thereof. For they behind, thinking to breake in amongst the other, did hinder the first that they could not flee: in which vnderlie multitude, manie were troden under foot, and three score were killed with the sword.

The cardinall (although against his mind) hauing heard of the victorie of Ruthwen; yet he did not greatlie lament the slaughter made of his aduersaries. After this, the cardinall hauing thus sufficientlie progressed to Angus: he led the gouernour after the fourteenth of December to saint Andzeus, to the end (if it were possible) to bind the gouernour more firmelie vnto him. For although before he had the gouernours sonne as pledge with him; yet (as often as he remembred the eagerne of the Scottish nobilitie, the strength of his enimies, and the inconstancie of the gouernour) he greatlie feared, least the said gouernour should with like lightnesse be drawn, to assist his enimies, as he had bene led to take his part. During the time whilest they were at S. Andzeus, the cardinall caused in the Lent season all the bishops & prelates of the realme to assemble at the towne of saint Andzeus, where a learned man, named maister George Wilschart, that had bene in the scholes of Germanie, was accused of heresie, which he had (as was alleged against him) publickly preached, and priuatly taught in Dundee, Brechin, and diuerse other parts of Scotland, since his returne home. This matter was so urged against him, that he was conuict, and burnt there in the towne of saint Andzeus during the time of that conuention or assemblee.

George Wilschart a learned man burnt.

When these things were thus done, the cardinall, although he greatlie trusted to his riches; yet because he was not ignorant what were the minds of men, & what speeches the common people had of him) determined to increase his power with new deuises. Wherefore he goeth into Angus, and marieth his eldest daughter (as saith Buchanan) to the earle of Crawford's sonne. Which marriage was solemnized with great preparation, almost answerable to kinglie magnificence. During which time, the cardinall vnderstanding by his spies, that the English did prepare to invade the Scottish borders on the sea (and speciallie did threaten those of Fife therewith) returned to saint Andzeus, and appointed a day to the nobilitie, and such as dwelled about the sea coasts, to assemble together to prouide in common for the defense thereof, and to prepare remedie for that hastened euill. For the easier and better performance thereof, he had determined, together with the lords of that countrie, to haue sailed himselfe about the coasts, and to haue defended such places as were most conuenient.

Buchanan, lib. 15.

Amongest others that came vnto him, there was a noble yong gentleman called Rozman Leslie, sonne to the earle of Kothleise, whereof we haue spoken before manie times. This man (after that he had manie times emploied his valiant and faithfull diligence in the behalfe of the cardinall) grew to some contention with the said cardinall for a priuat cause, which for a time did estrange both their minds the one from the other. This same contention did Rozman (being thereto induced with manie faire promises) afterwards let fall. But certeine moneths following (when he returned to demand the performance of such liberall promises) they began to grow from common speech to biallings, and from thence to bitter satvnts & reproches, not fit to be vsed by anie of them both. Whereupon they departed with the græued minds of euerie of them. For the cardinall being intreated more vnreuerentlie than he would or looked for; and the other threatening that being overtaken by deceit, he would reuenge it: they both returned discontented to their owne people. Whereupon Rozman, declaring to his partakers the intollerable arrogancie of the cardinall, they easilie agreed all to conspire his death. Wherefore, to the end that the same might be lesse suspected, they departed in sunder after ward. This Rozman accompanied onelie with five of his owne traine, entred the towne of saint Andzeus, and went into his accustomed Inne and lodging; trusting that by such small traine he might cunningly dissemble the determination of the cardinals death. But there were in that towne, ten of those which had consented to this conspiracie; which closed in secret corners, some in one place, and some in an other, did onelie expect the signe which was to be giuen by ging, were to the herie wals of the castell, which battered the same in such sort, as the ditches were nere hand filled with the rubbish and stones of the wals that fell doونه.

Whereover, the gallies at an high water approached on the river side so nere to the castell, that with shot of canons and other artillerie, they sore annoyed them within, and thus diverse. The defendants perceiving themselves thus besieged on all sides, & not able long to hold out, put forth a token upon a speares point, to signifie that they desired parlee, which was granted, and certeine of them coming forth, were admitted to talke with the gouernor, the quene, and the prior of Capoa. They offered to render the castell, so they might depart, and haue their liues saued with bag and baggage.

But, this would not be granted; the gouernor utterly refusing it; at length he was content to pardon them of their liues, if the French king should thinke it good, else to stand to his pleasure. The spoile of the castell was giuen to the Frenchmen, who by on the surrender entering the same, left nothing behind him that might serue them to any use in forking it away. All the principall men within, it were led to the gallies, and conueied aboue into France prisoners at the French kings discretion. Diverse of them were committed to sundrie prisons on the coast of Britaine, and others were appointed to row in the gallies till the yeare 1550, in which the prisoners we set at libertie, and the others that were in the gallies were redeemed by their friends for certeine summes of monie.

Thus was the castell of saint Andreus rendered the nine and twentieth of Julie, fourtene daies after the arrivall there of the prior of Capoa, whereby his great magnificence, well known afore that time, was increased, as his praise for his speedie dispatch and good successe therein was much advanced. Shortly after, the duke of Summerset, heretofore in this booke named earle of Hereford, uncle by the mother unto the yong king of England, and admitted gouernor of his person, and protector of all his realms, dominions, and subjects, minding the advancement of the yong king his nephew, thought good with all speed to procure the consummation of the marriage, betwixt him, and the yong quene of Scots.

But, perceiving that the same could not be brought to passe without force, he seemed loth to let passe the opportunity of time then offered (as he took it) to serue his purpose; and thereupon by aduise of counsell, leuied an armie with all expedition, and came to Berwick, about the latter end of August, and in the beginning of September entered Scotland with the same armie, containinge seauentene thousand men, which was diuided into three principall bands, the vndermost guarded by the barons, the earle of Argyll, the earle of Mar, the earle of Glencaigne, and the earle of Huntly, and the rest was by the lord Darnley, the north and southward, and the eastward.

There were certein druggs and troopes of men of armes, demilances, and light horsemen, (and also of harquebusers), that attended upon these three bands, and were by the lord Darnley, high-marshal of the armie, the general conduct of the men of armes and demilances, was Francis Baskin, lieutenant of the light horsemen, with right hundred of the same, was appointed with the barons, and Peter Mowbray, captain of five hundred harquebusers, and six of canons, Fleming, master of the ordnance, with a thousand light horsemen, were appointed to the battell. And the lord Darnley, with five hundred light horsemen, attended upon the rearward.

In this order marching through the spers, and Louthian, they came at length into a place called Buckling Braigs, nere to the Forth side, in which river the English fleet was arrived, and lay before the towne of Leith, but now by order giuen came backe from thence, and lay nearer to the armie. The gouernor of Scotland aduertised of the coming of this armie of England thus to invade Scotland, with all diligence sent abroad solemn summons for the leuieing of a new armie forth of all parts of the realme; supposing thereby to be sufficientlie furnished and enabled for the encounter; happen when it should; the contrarie part (no doubt) being likewise opinioned, and both hoping, or greedilie gaping after the glorie of victorie.

For the gouernor did attempt at this time that which is accustomed to be used in the greatest dangers of the countrie: which was, that he sent out messengers through all the realme, who carrying a herie crosse in their hands, should make signe (and declare) aswell to the laitie, as to the churchmen; that all they which were aboue fiftene yeares old, and vnder fiftie, should presentlie (with their armes) repair to Mussilborow, and there be ready to defend the libertie of the countrie; who accordingly came to Mussilborow (within lesse than two miles of the place where the English armie came to incampe, lieng at Preston) placed themselves at Inverness out against their enemies.

Here we haue to vnderstand, that the Scots light horsemen oftentimes would come picking almost within their stauens length of the Englishmen as they marched, whooping and shouting, to the end they might traine them forth from their strength, and with railing words would still be in hand to provoke them thereto. But the duke of Summerset, doubting the goodnesse of the Scottish pickers, gave secret commandement, that no offer of skirmish by the Scottish horsemen should be taken. But at length the lord Greie of Wilton, not able to heare such bold presumption in the Scots, aduenturing (as he took it) ouer rashlie, and more than stood with their owne suertie, made sute to the duke of Summerset, that if they continued in such brauerie, it might be lawfull for him to set them further off.

The duke at the first by no means would assent thereto, telling the lord Greie, that his desire proceeded more of a colic of courage, than of any knowledge of the enemie, and seemed to defend the goodnesse of the Scottish horsemen; but when the lord Greie persisted in his sute, and the earle of Argyll likewise assisted his request, the duke in the end yielded thereto. Whereupon when the lord Darnley with the Scots the next time (which was on the Fridaye the ninth of September) came forth to offer the skirmish after their wonted manner, the lord Greie taking with him certeine bands of horsemen, both men of armes, demilances, and also light horsemen, diuided them in troopes, appointing the Spanish and Italian bagbutters on horsebacke to keepe on a wing, and to guard the hindermost troope of the English horsemen.

He also gave order to the leaders of euerie troope, that to which soeuer the enemie should once offer, in any wise, that no answer by skirmish were made them, but after they had drawne them to their accustomed plaie, and offer of charge, that troope that it was offered unto, presentlie upon the enemie whooping about should throughlie giue it them; and that to giuen, the next troope presentlie to giue it in the face: and so (as occasion required) both those troopes wholie together to helpe other without breaking. The Scots coming forward, picking and whooping after their old wont, the Englishmen for a long while, till at the last, foure or five hun-

These thinking then to have wheeled about, master Nicholas Gainsford, the leader of that trope, and lieutenant of the lord Greys band of his men of armes of Bullongne, cried: A charge, which as speedily on the English part as unlooked for of the Scots being given, from charging at that time in sport, the Scots were dyuen to gallop afoote so fast as their horses might beare them, losing of their companies that were taken and slaine, to the number of eight hundred and more (as some haue written) [at that time the lord Hume (as saith Lesleus lib. 10. pa. 486) falling from his horse, was grievously wounded, and caried to Edinburgh, and his eldest sonne was taken prisoner] but yet, as diuerse of the Englishmen aduentured too farre in following the chase, they were distressed, and sundrie of them taken prisoners, among the which were some of their captains, as Sir Rafe Bulmer, Thomas Colver, & Robert Crouch, each of them hauing in charge the leading of several bands of light hoylmen. & Thus much for this Fridays skirmish, wherein the chiefe force of the Scottish hoylmen was defeated, to the great discouragement of the rest.

* The English armie remaining still at Preston, did from a hill behold the number of the Scots, who (supposing that they saw a greater number than in truth there was) assembled in the meane time to consult of the estate of their affaires. And thereupon sent letters to the Scots, desiring that if they might obtayne any thing by iustice, that they should rather end the warre with covenants than with canons. The effect of which letters tended to this end. That the English did greatlie intreat the Scots, first to remember that both armies were christian men, to end of whome (vnlesse they vtterlie forget their profession) there should nothing be more welcome nor desired than peace & tranquillitie, and nothing more detestable than warre and vnjust force. Besides this, that the cause of this present warre did not grow of couetousnesse, hatred or enuie, but from the desire of perpetuall peace, which could not be better or more firmelie established by any means, but by the league of matrimonie (being promised and confirmed by the publike consent and pledge of the nobilitie) with those conditions which were more beneficiall for the Scots than the English, being such as did not call them into seruitude, but into a felowship and libertie imparting of all their fortunes each to other. For so much more should that marriage be commodious to the Scots than to the English, by how much the hope of profit, and the feare of injuries should be greater from the stronger to the weaker.

Wherefore they should chieflie consider (and in this kind) this to be their greatest reason, that since that their queene was of necessitie to be giuen in marriage by the Scots, and that the same necessitie was not to be avoided; and the moderation therein beie hard: that the onelie power to chuse hir a husband was left vnto the publike countell or parliament. And if they would chuse (to their queene) a husband for the publike profit and dignitie: of whome could they better take chuse, than of a king their neighbor, borne in the same land, nere of blood, instructed in the same lawes, brought vp in the same manners and language; not their superior onelie in riches, but almost also in all commodities and ornaments of externall things, and such a person which did bring with him peace, concord, amitie, and the forgetting of all old injuries: But if they call to them any other (differing from them in language, manners, and lawes) to take the kingdom: let them thinke with themselves, what and how manie commodities will grow thereby, and to what euill counsels they shall indanger themselves: the which they may learne by the example of other nations, being farre better to be taught it by the misfortunes of others, than to feele the smart thereof by their owne experience.

Wherefore (as touching themselves) if they shall not perseuere the Scottish nation to be estranged from this amitie and concord; they would mitigate somewhat of their former promises (which by law they might challenge) and be contented that the maiden queene should be brought vp amongst them, and be alwaies in their power, vntill the time that nature should enable hir fit for marriage, and vntill such time as she might chuse hir a husband by the aduise of the nobilitie. And that in the meane time (vntill the same might be performed) that both the nations should abstaine from warre: and that also the queene (during that time) should neither be conueied into any strange nation: nor that they should conclude any pact or covenant with the French, or any other foreign prince touching hir marriage. The which if the Scots would most holilie and handsomelie promise, the English would forthwith depart with a quiet armie. And further, that if the English had committed any hurt or spoile (since they came into the countrey) they would recompense the same by the indgement of good men.

These letters thus sent, the gouernour did impart vnto a few, and of those especiallie to John his brother bishop of saint Andrews (taken vnto him in place & authoritie of the slaine cardinall.) These two advanced with great hope of victorie, were the cause that these letters were suppressed, because they feared that if the equall conditions of peace were knowne abroad, the most part would willingly incline to the same quiet aduise. Wherefore they procured a false rumour to be spread through the host, that the English men were come thither with determination to take afoote the queene by force, and by strength of armes to bring the whole kingdom into their subjection. For the gouernour being faint spirited by nature, had chosen vnto him foure such other counsellors (like vnto himselfe) in the affaires of warre, by whose command & becke all things were performed. Of which number were his three kinsmen, John archbishop of saint Andrews, the abbat of Dunfermling, George Dornie, with Archibald Beton; and the fourth was Hugh Wigg, a lawyer, rather famous for his grosse bodie and foolish conditions, than any knowledge in iudiciall affaires. Wherefore had so passed by the gouernour (inconstant by his owne nature, and changing his counsell by the wind of euery rumour) that he would with stopped eares heare all other mens opinions. At the same time, his friends hauning spread a faigned tale (through the Scottish host) by which means the Scots ran in all hast to their weapons, whose vnadvised speed was in the end the cause of their vnfortunate proceedings, as after shall appeare.

For the long tye (as the Scots haue reported) that the gouernour, and the nobilitie of Scotland meant not to haue battell with their owne realm, but rather to let William defende their ground, if the Englishmen should come forward to giue them battell there. The Englishmen aduised thereof, the more rois at this great slackness, caused their field be erected; putting off to take an hill called Pinkhill, where they might place their ordinance, and to that into the Scottish campe, whereby they should force the Scots to viltage from their ground of advantage. The gouernour and the Scottish lords, beholding their enemies thus marching forward, thought best to state their enterprise, and therefore suddenly, notwithstanding their former determination, rushing forth of their campe, passed forward to encounter their enemies.

They were divided into three battels; Archibald Dohglasse earle of Angus, with certeine lords with him, led the vant-gard; George Gordon earle of Huntley, and his friends the rere-ward; and the gouernor accompanied with the earle of Argyle and the rest of the noble men, were in the maine battell. The Englishmen hauing got the hill, and percetuing the Scots to come forwarde with great hast, staied for their comming: but the Scots were so rash and hastie, passing first through the water in their armour, and so by towards the hill, that continuing their march with such speed, as they seemed rather to trot, than to keepe anie ordinarie marching pace, before they could come to ioine with the Englishmen, they were almost out of breath.

Hobobert, the earle of Angus, and the other in the vant-gard, boldlie abid the charge of all the English horsemen, and so rigorously reencountred them, that slaieng and beating downe no small number both of men and horses, they put the rest to flight; so that no small part of them retired backe in such disorder, that they ran thorough the rankes of the footmen in the fore-ward, wherewith such feare entered among the Englishmen, that (as hath bene reported) they had vnboughtlie fled, if the manfull courage of the earle of Marwick had not bene shewed at that present, according to the wonted valour of his often approued prowesse, whereby he caused them to staie, and relie themselves againe.

In the meane time, the battell and the rere-ward of the Scots advanced forward with great courage. But there was a gailie & two pinesses of the English fleet, which from the sea shot so terrible at the Scottish armie, that the same was not onelie fore galled and indamaged thereby, but also staied, that they could not come easilie forward. And herewith the English vant-gard incouraged with the comfortable words and behauior of the earle of Marwick, and other the capteins, made towards the Scottish vant-gard againe: the which not able of it selfe to resist, retired in good order to the great battell of Scotland. Whereupon, the multitude fearing, by reason they saw them in the fore-ward thus retire (albeit in good order) that all had bene lost, gaue backe, and toke them to flight; whome the Englishmen followed amaine, slaieng the Scottishmen downe on heaps in passing great numbers. Manie were also drowned in the water of Undereske, through the which they toke their flight.

The earle of Huntley and the rere-gard stood still with their ensignes and banners, till the chace was past by them: but at length were driuen to make a waie as well as the rest, and the earle himselfe in the retire being taken on foot, well clad in gilt armour inameled, was led prisoner to the lord protector. Diuerse other men of name, barons, and knights, were taken prisoners. There were slaine no small number of personages of good account. Among other, the lord Fleming, the master of Erskin, the master of Graham, the master of Mestine, the master of Agilvie, the master of Levingston, the master of Kelle [the master of Argendale and Mestane] the lord of Lechintwar, the lord of Glencarnocke, & others. [There were taken prisoners diuerse noble men, the lord Zelfrie, the earle of Huntley chancelor of the realme, and others, as saith Lesleus lib. 10. pag. 487.]

The next day, the English armie removed to Leith, where the prisoners were put into a church, diuerse of them being fore wounded. But the earle of Huntley, entering bond for them that they should well and trulie paie their ranfomes, agreed upon between them and their takers, or else to come and present themselves prisoners in England by a certeine day, they were suffered to depart. * The calamitie of this bloody day, there were not a few which did impute iustlie to happen to the Scots, because they did arrogantlie reject such honorable and beneficiall peace, and did hope (if they obtained the victorie) to haue vsed more crueltie to their owne people than vnto the English, either because they would (as I my selfe coniecture) reuenge old quarels, or else haue vsed extremitie against such as secretlie misliked this conflict with the English.)

The gouernor escaping from the battell, came to Striueling, where the quene regent was, together with hir daughter the yong quene. Here, by the counsell and aduise of the earle of Angus [Argyle, Kotesen, and Castles] and diuerse other lords that were also withdrawne thither after the battell, they were conueied to the countrie of Penteth, where they remained in the abbete of Inch Mahome [deliuering the yong quene to hir mother, Erskine and Leuingstone to be kept there] till the English armie was departed out of the realme, and then they removed againe, and came to Striueling. [After that the gouernor had deliuered the earle out of prison at Edenburgh] the English nanie Iuan the Ile of saint Colmes Inch [in the meane time] and did sundrie other exploits by sea, as in the English historie it may appere.

Moreover, the earle of Bothwell, whome the gouernor had before kept in prison, and was the night after the battell set at libertie, repared to the duke of Summerset, with diuerse other lords and gentlemen of Louthian, whilst he laie at Leith, offering themselves to be at the king of Englands commandement, and so were assured from receiuing hurt or damage by the English power. The duke of Summer-set hauing remained at Leith eight daies, burnt a peece of it, and demanding the castell of Edinburgh, but could not obtaine it, departed thence the eightteenth of December homewards the next waie, ouer the mountains of Soutreie, comming the third day before the castell of Hume, where they did so much by countenancing to win that forresse, that within three or foure daies after their comming thither, it was surrendered.

This castell being twone, & a garrison left there, in to keepe it, they removed to Rockesburgh, where within the compasse of the ruinous walls of an old castell, they built a fort; & after returning into England, left a conuenient garrison to keepe it. They got also about the same time a strong forresse, called Fast castell, standing nere to the sea side, and placed a garrison within it. And moreover, in this meane time, their fleet by sea Iuan the castell of Broughtie crag, and put in like manner a garrison within it to keepe the same (as in the English historie it may further appere) and in that sort also all the chiefest lords and gentlemen of the pers and Wuidale came in, and submitted themselves to the duke of Summer-set, vpon assurance had and giuen.

Furthermore, whilst the duke of Summerset with his armie did thus invade Scotland on the east part, it was ordeined by the said duke, and other of the counsell to the king of England, that Patthe earle of Lennox, and Thomas lord Wharton, then warden of the west marches of England, should with a power invade Scotland on the west side, to the end that there should not anie of the west borders nor countries come to assist the gouernor against the duke of Summersets armie, but be driuen to re-maine at home to defend their owne countrie. Here-vpon, there was an armit levied, to the number of five thousand footmen, and eight hundred light horsemen, with which powder the earle of Lennor and the lord Wharton entering Scotland the eight of September, incamped the first night upon the water of Esk, and marched the next day through the nether part of Annandale, till they came to the castell of Milke, a fortrese of good strength, the wals being foureteene foot thicke.

The capitaine of this castell was one John Steward, brother to the lord thereof, who upon the approach of the earle of Lennor, yielded the house to him, without any shew of resistance. Whereupon, Fergus Graham, brother to Richie Graham of Esk, was appointed with a garrison of souldiours to keepe that castell to the vse of the young king of England, and was afterwards confirmed capitaine there with fiftie light horsemen, by appointment of the duke of Summerset, & the counsell; so that during the wars, he remained there to the great annoiance of the Scots, enemies to England, and preservation of the countrie thereabouts to the king of Englands vse.

On the twentieth of September, the earle of Lennor, and the lord Wharton, incamped nere to the towne of Annand, and on the morrow after approaching nearer to the same, gaue summons vnto the capitaine thereof, called Lion, of the house of Glanus, who with an hundred Scots (whereof Marwell and Johnstone, and Cockpall (as saith Lesleus lib. 10. p. 489. being parcell) kept the church and steeple of Annand, being peeces of themselves verie strong and mightie reinforced with earth: they within therefore refused to yield, and valiantlie defended themselves. The greatest peeces of artillerie, which the Englishmen had there at that time, were certeine double and single falcons, wherewith they beat onelie the battlements, till they might with certeine engines approach hard to the wals, and undermine the same, so as the rose of the church was shaken downe, and a great number of them within the church slaine and crushed to death: Such as escaped fled into the steeple.

Two of the Englishmen that wrought about the mines, were slaine: but at length, the capitaine moved by perswasion of the earle of Lennor, to whom he claimed to be of kin, rendered the steeple to him, with himselfe, and 96 Scots souldiours, with condition to haue their liues onelie saued, and the capitaine to remaine prisoner, and to go into England. Immediately vpon their coming forth of the steeple, fire was giuen vnto the traines of powder in the mines, and so both the church & steeple were blown vp into the aire, & rased downe to the ground. This done, they burnt the towne (after they had sacked it) and left not one stone standing vpon another, so that the same towne had euer bene a verie handsome neighbour to England.

The Englishmen had conceived such spite towards this towne, that if they saw but a pece of timber remaining vnhurt, they would cut the same in peeces with their bills. The countrie here with was stricken in such feare, that the next day all the Bishops, Abbots, Clousters, Abboten, Priories, and the Bretherings, the Bels, the Rigs, the Spueries, and all the clanes and townes of the nether part of Annandale, came in, and receiued an oath of obedience, as subiects to the king of England, deliuering pledges for their assured loialtie. The residue that would not come in and submit themselves, had their houses burnt, their goods and cattell fetched away by the English light horsemen, that were sent abroad into the countrie for that purpose.

These things done, the earle of Lennor, and the lord Wharton, returned backe into England with their prisoners, booties, and spoiles; receiuing great thanks and commendations by gentle letters on the first of twentieth of September, from the duke of Summerset, then lieng at Rockesburgh, about fortifying of that place. The gouernour perceiuing thus that without the assistance of France he should not be able to resist the Englishmen, hauing now got his foot hold within the realme of Scotland, requir'd the queene Dowager, and monsieur Doissell, ligger ambassador for the French king, to perswade with him by letters, to send an armie into Scotland, to the aid of his friends there.

The queene and monsieur Doissell, perceiuing a readie waie prepared to bring that to passe which they most desired (which was, to haue the queene of Scotland ordered in all things by the French kings aduise) they undertooke to procure an armie out of France, according to the gouernours desire, if he with the states of the realme would agree that the queene might be sent into France, and a contract made for his bestowing in marriage, as stood with the French kings pleasure. The gouernour condescending hereto, assembled the states, and by their aduises, passed certeine covenants to the effect aforesaid, & sent the same in writing by certeine messengers into France.

The French king gladiie accepting this message, prepared a nauie of ships and gallies to transport an armie into Scotland the next summer. In the meane time, the gouernour laied siege to Broughtie crag, and the duke of Summerset, as well for meane to cause the Scots to retire that siege, as also for the annoiance of Cildesdale, appertaining to the gouernour, and the earle of Angus, and other Scots that would not come in to the obedience of the king of England, appointed the earle of Lennor to make a new invasion into Scotland, and to vse for trial of their skelties the helpe of two thousand Scottish light horsemen, that were already assured & sworn to serue the king of England in all such exploits in which they should be imployed.

The earle of Lennor desirous to aduance the king of Englands affaires, and hauing receiued letters from William earle of Glencarne, with promise of his assistance, and likewise of his father, in law the earle of Angus, the lord of Dymmlanrig, and those lords and gentlemen of the countie of Aile, Cunningham, Renfren, and Lennor, entered Scotland about the twelfth of December, accompanied with Henrie Wharton, second son to the lord Wharton, with two hundred light horsemen, of the garrisons in Scotland, and coming first to Dunfreis, where the generall assemble was appointed of the two thousand assured Scottish light horsemen, when the musters should be taken, he found scarce three hundred, and those for the more part of the broken countie of Annandale, Cildesdale, Cildale, and Cildale.

The earle of Glencarne came thither indeed, but under a counterfeit shew of good meaning, where in truth he meant nothing but craft to discouer all the earle of Lennor his purposes, who perceiuing his double dealing, and finding no such forces readie to assist him as he looked for, and moreover, mistrusting the loialtie of the maister of Marwell, & the gentlemen of Cildesdale, meaning (as he took it) to intrap him, and deliuer him to the queene Dowager, and the french gouernour, stood in some perplexitie what way should be the best for him to follow, thinking it not to stand with his honor to returne, without attaining some enterprize.

The earle of Glencarne had theiued to him two letters written by the lord of Dymmlanrig, & said that if the earle of Lennor came, accompanied onellie with Scottishmen, he would buyterne him and honor him in the best sort he might; but if he brought those Englishmen in his company, he would not onellie refuse to aid him, but also raise all the power he might make, either by his friends or supporters, to resist him, and put him a repulse. The earle thus perceiving that he was in danger to be betrayed among them, and that they were all the dooless practises that might be used to those that should come to the devotion of the king of England, dissembled the matter with Glencarne, and other that were skynned to betray him; pretending to them that he would follow the chyns of their desires.

The earle of Lennox dissembled with dissemblers.

But in the meantime he got together the English captains that were appointed to attend him, and also such Scottishmen as he knew he might trust. Arriving to scourge Drumlanrig, to cut him short; for that he was the chief instrument to state all the Scottishmen in those parties from entering friendship with the Englishmen: he gave secret warning to all the captains & leaders about nine of the clocke at night; that they should be ready with their men to move on horsebacke at the sound of the trumpet, and keepe with them the earle of Glencarne, the maister of Sparwell, the lords of Clodburne, Litchinichell, and others the gentlemen of Piddedale and Annandale.

Hossemen sent forth to scourge Drumlanrig.

They harrie the countrie about Drumlanrig.

He sent forth six hundred chosen horsemen upon sound of the trumpet, at twelue of the clocke at night, under the leading of Henrie Wharton, and other the captains of the garrisons, who in the bathing of the next morning, arrived nere the place of Drumlanrig, where they appointed four hundred of their horsemen to passe to the forate, who raised fire, and burnt two milles in length, both townes and villages on each side, euen unto the gates of Drumlanrig, spoiling the houses of goods and riches, worth to the value of two thousand marks; got three thousand sheepe, two thousand herd of great cattell, besides nine score horses and mares.

The Annandalers laden with spoile and cattell, being in number four hundred men, departed with their prete homelwards. The lord of Drumlanrig, lying all this while in ambush with seven hundred men, forbore to breake out to give any charge upon his enemies, doubting least the earle of Lennox had kept a skale behind; but now after he perceived that the most part of the enemies were departed, and that the residue of the gentlemen & captains of the English horsemen were withdrawing towards Dunfreis, being not past six score men, he fiercely followed after them with his power, in hope not onellie to overthrow and disperse them, but also to take the earle of Lennox at Dunfreis.

Drumlanrig pursueth the Englishmen.

He is put to flight.

Passer Henrie Wharton and those six score horsemen, retiring beyond the water of Jyth, and perceiving that Drumlanrig and his men entered the water ready to pursue them, returned, and gave such a desperate charge upon them, that Drumlanrig and his company were scattered and put to flight: yet Drumlanrig himselfe, although there were some speares broken upon him, through the goodnesse of his horse escaped. Two gentlemen of his surname and traine, that were in no small estimation with him, were slaine, and six score prisoners taken, and led to Dunfreis. The terror of this overthrow, and the byte of the earle of Lennox his entrie thus made into Scotland, caused the governor to leave his siege from Broughtie crag, and with speed come from thence, the better to defend his countreies of Clidedale, and Dowlagladale. so that the Scots certes lost diverse hardie personages: and among other, Gaden Hamilton, the governor's kinsman, was slaine at the same siege.

Appoynted the prior of Dunferme by his letters and messengers, offered himselfe to be the king of England; and the inhabitants of the burrough and haueir townes of Ellington and Kirkcaldie, the knights of Loghinwar and Carleis, the lord and tutor of Bombie, the lord of Cardines, & all the gentlemen of Annandale, Piddedale, and Galloway, euen to Dunferme, being foure score miles in length from Carleis, though the inducement of the foresaid prior, and of the knights of Loghinwar and Carleis, (for the favour they bare to the earle of Lennox) with in two daies after the discomfiture of Drumlanrig, came unto Dunferme, and there received an oth to be true to the king of England; and afterwards went with the earle to Carleis, leaving the countrie in good quiet, and the king of England acknowledged for lord of Galloway, Piddedale, and Annandale, by the inhabitants thereof.

The Scots deliver pledges.

And after that the foresaid persons had remained for a space at Carleis, they delivered pledges, but especiallie for John Sparwell, & returned home to their countrie, as assured men & subiects to the R. of England. In this meane while, the governor having held siege before the castell of Broughtie crag, by the space of thirtie daies, and now retiring from thence (as before ye haue heard) by the aduise of the principall lords about him, he caused maister James Haliburton, tutor of those parties, to raise certeine companies of horsemen, and appointed him with captaine Westmouth (whome he left in Dundee with certeine footmen) to defend the countrie against the Englishmen, if they issued forth of Broughtie crag, to achieve any enterpryse: and where nere thereabouts.

James Haliburton, Captaine Westmouth.

The duke of Summerset by aduise of the residue of the counsell in England, minding to bynde the Scots that refused to come in & submit themselves to the king of England, took order with the lord of Wilton, who (as faith Lesleus lib. 10. pag. 491.) remained in Scotland from the fourth Ides of Aprill, untill the tenth kalends of June for the building of one fort at Wader, and an other at Waddington; as in the English historie it may appeare. And farther it was appointed also, that about the end of February, the earle of Lennox and the lord Wharton, with seven hundred English horsemen, beside the assured Scots horsemen, and about four or five thousand English footmen, should by the west borders invade Scotland: they according to their commission set forward, and the first night came to Luchinabien, and there lodged.

The next day they marched to Dunfreis, and whilst they remained there, the earle of Angus bearing come to Drumlanrig, by messengers entred some talke with his sonne in law the earle of Lennox. But sith it was perceived that this was done, rather to intrap the earle of Lennox, or rather at the least wise to buye time, upon consultation had with the maister of Sparwell, the lord of Clodborne, and others the gentlemen assured of Piddedale and Annandale, it was concluded, that the townes of Sperton, Duldere, and others, nere adjoining together in those parts, should be burnt; to the end that the earle of Angus might so be drawn to the field, and caught by some one meane or other.

The earle of Lennox and the L. Wharton invade Scotland.

The dissimulation of the earle of Angus.

About midnigh therefore, the forate being set forth, under the leading of maister Henrie Wharton, to the number of twelue hundred light horsemen, the maister of Sparwell, now lord Herries, and the residue of the assured men being amongst them kept forward, and in the morning the earle of Lennox, Maister Henrie Wharton.

Lennox, and the lord Wharton marched forth with the footmen, till they came ten miles beyond Dunfreis. And there the earle of Angus was drawn to the castell of Drumlanrig, vnder pretense to commune with his sonne the earle of Lennox (but meaning to intrap him) if it were possible, he was so intrapped by the English footmen per he could haue sufficient warning, that he was forced to flee onelis with five persons in his companie. But now the English horsemen being come to Dundere, eight & fortie miles within the realme of Scotland, hauing passed sundrie great riuers, they set that towne on fire.

The earle of Angus put to flight.

Dundere set on fire.

But the maister of Marwell, with the other Scottish gentlemen and light horsemen borderers, to the number of foure hundred, being in companie of the English horsemen (as before ye haue heard) had contriued the destruction of the Englishmen afore hand. And the better to worke their feat, they had procured (as ye haue heard) the earle of Angus to come vnto Drumlanrig with a chosen power of men for that purpose. There were also vpon euerie hill about, great numbers of Scottish footmen, with speares and lancehaues to assist the earle of Angus and his complices against the Englishmen. The lord of Drumlanrig with a number of chosen horsemen was advanced forward in sight of the Englishmen, as they were busie in firing the towne of Dundere.

The revolting of the assured Scots.

The assured Scots therefore, thinking the enterprise to be surer inough conueid for their contriued purpose, openlie vpon the field nere to Dundere, hoisting vp a blacke pennil vpon a speares point for a token, revolted whole, and isoned themselves to the lord of Drumlanrig and other their countrie men, & thrust in betwixt the English horsemen & footmen, to the great perill of distressing aswell the one as the other. For making toward the place where the earle of Lennox, and the lord Wharton were coming forward with their footmen, nere to the old castell of Dauswinton, sometime the house of the Cumings, they bruted it abroad, that the English horsemen were quite ouerthrowen.

A false rumor spread.

The earle of Lennox, beholding the manner of his aduersaries, lighted on foot from his horse, willing the lord Wharton to do the like; for this day (said he) I will die a true Englishman. At length the English horsemen fetching a compasse in retreating backe from Dundere, came nere to the place where the earle and the lord Wharton were ranged in order of battell: and thinking no lesse but that their horsemen had bene ouerthrowen, were readie to march backe towards Dunfreis. But their horsemen thus comming in, and perceluing how the matter stood, gaue a right valiant charge vpon the Scots, that stood countenancing the footmen, and readie to take the aduantage, if they might haue diuened them through thinking backe into anie disorder.

But such was the violence of the shoocke giuen at that instant, with great manhood (vndoubtedlie) by the English horsemen, that the Scots were there with put out of arrais, scattered, & quite put to flight; the lord of Drumlanrig being taken prisoner, corrupted his taker, and so got away. The maister of Marwell escaped in great danger of life, for he had sundrie speares broken on him in the chase as he fled awate. There were yet taken that day of the Scots to the number of foure hundred, beside sundrie that were drowned in the water of Forth. Amongest the prisoners were these men of name; the abbat of new abbete, Christie Fretwining of Bonshaw, a brother of the lord of Hemyfield, & manie other gentlemen of name. sher, and a martiall court appointed there for execution of pledges; but yet suspended and staied, till the counsels pleasure might be knowen in that behalfe.

There were at the first euill newes spread abroad, and certified to the court of England of this towne, how the earle of Lennox and the English armie was ouerthrowen, so that it was by order appointed, that the earle of Derby, the Lord Scrope, and Coniers, with their powers should repaire to the west borders to garnish the same for defense against the enemies: but vpon the true report how the matter had passed, made by maister Henrie Wharton, and one Bishop a Scottishman, sent in post for that purpose, that appointment was staied; and maister Wharton was at that time made knight, and the said Bishop richlie rewarded for bringing so good newes. There were letters directed downe from the counsell to the lord Wharton, for the execution of certein pledges, that is to saie, the maister of Marwells pledge, being one of his nearest kinsmen of the house of the Berries, also the warden of the Greie friers in Dunfreis, the vicar of Carlawerocke, and diuerse other which were executed at Carlill. In this meane time were the forts at Latholme and Hadington built, the castles of Wether and Dalwick towne, all the mills burnt, with in foure miles of each hand of Edinburgh, and other exploits achieved by the Englishmen, as in the historie of England is more at large expessed.

But now the French king, hauing prepared an armie readie to come into Scotland, caused the same to draw downe to Brest in Britaine, where the ships and gallies were rigged and made readie to passe therewith into Scotland. The chiefe leaders of which armie were these, which had charge chiefe to command in the same: monsieur de Wesse lieutenant generall, monsieur Wandelot coronell of the French footmen, the counte Keingraue coronell of the Almains, monsieur de Halleraie, monsieur Dossell, Pietro Strozze coronell of the Italians, monsieur Etanges capteine of the horsemen, sir Nicholas de Villegaignon a knight of the Rhodes (or rather Malta) capteine of the gallies, and monsieur Duno commissarie of the artillerie: with diuerse other worthe personages, and men of approved valiance. These capteins with their powers being imbarked at Brest, sailed alongst by the east seas, and at length about the middell of June came into the rode before Lesh, where they landed their people and ordinance. [A little before whose arrivall into France (as fasti Lesleus, libro 10. pag. 491.) Chapelle Brionne landed in Scotland, accompanied with other nobilitie of France, to giue good counsell to the Scots answerable to the time, which was (to please their eares therewith) that there should a greater armie hostile come out of France, to succor their extremities.]

Afterwards, with the aduise of the gouernor, and other of the Scottish lords, the French power went to besiege Hadington, and comming thither, incamped themselves in places of aduantage about the towne, cast trenches, planted their ordinance, battered the rampires, and kept them within streittlie besieged on each hand, vsing all the waies they could deuise to constrain the Englishmen to yield. They forbore yet to giue a generall assault, because they would not hazard (as they haue reported) the losse of so manie men, as might haue bene slaine and maimed thereby, to the great weakening of their power there, hauing not meanes to supplie it when they would.

And yet they had a great armie of Scots with them for a season, and had made the breaches so reasonable, conable, that with small paine they might have entered by the same, if the force of the defendants had not sufficed with handblowes to haue beaten them backe, as no doubt there was no want of good wils in them so to haue done, if the Frenchmen had put the matter in triall: yet during this siege, they with in had in great necessitie of things behouefull for the defense of the towne. Whereupon Sir Henrie Wharton with a band of light horsemen of the west borders, and others, came and put into the towne a certeine number of men with powder, and other necessaries, greatlie for the reliefe of the besieged, & no lesse displeasure of the Frenchmen and Scots, that were not aware of this enterpryse till it was done in the night season, by the good and fortunate conducti- on of them that had the conuenance thereof.

But after this, there came a power of English horsemen to the number of little lesse than two thousand gentlemen, light horsemen, & harquebussiers on horsebacke, under the leading of Sir Robert Bolwes, Sir Thomas Palmer, Sir Henrie Wharton, capitaine Gambo a Spaniard, and others; the which aduenturing ouer rashlie with in danger of the whole French power, were overthrowne and chased: Sir Robert Bolwes, & Sir Thomas Palmer, with a great number of other capitaine, gentlemen and soldiers being taken prisoners, besides those that were slaine. Yet after this overthrow of those horsemen, the French removed their siege from the places where they had first planted it, and lodged further off from the towne, continuing there; till at length by an armie sent forth of England vnder the conduct of the erle of Shrewsburie, the lord Greie, and others, they were constrained to retire from thence, as in the English historie ye may find more largelie expresse, to the which for the further report of the euents chancing during that siege, I referre the reader.

But this is to be remembred, that whilst the siege remained at Haddington, by a convention or assemblie of the lords it was decreed, that the quene should be sent into France. And thereupon monsieur de Millegaignon, with foure galleies departing from Leith, made semblance as though he would haue sailed into France: but hauing passed the mouth of the Forth, he turned his course on the left hand to passe alongst the shore northward by the Germane seas, that compassing the land on the east side, he might passe about by the Isles of Orkney, and so by the west Isles, till he came to Dunzetton where the yong quene laie. This iourne he fortunatelie achieved, the same neuer before (to mans remembrance) being made or attempted with galleies.

At his arrivall a conuenient landing at Dunzetton, he found all things readie provided, necessarie for the imbarcking of the quene, that he might conuey her into France, for the accomplishment wherof he had taken that iourne in hand. Whereupon she being brought aboard into the kings owne gallee, wherein monsieur de Brezze was also appointed to be a board with her, as he that had bene sent with expresse commandement to see her conueied into France, [with the lords (as saith Lesleus lib. 10. 494) of Arlesking, and Levingston, the ladie Fleming, with certeine noble maidens named after the yong quene, as Marie Levingston, Marie Fleming, Marie Seton, and Marie Beton] who together with Millegaignon shewed such diligence in achieving that enterpryse, that finally they arrived with prosperous wind and weather in the haven of West in Britaine with that yong quene, being as then betwixt five and six yeeres of age.

From thence being accompanied with the nobilitie of that prouince, she kept her right course to the kings palace of S. Germins in the towne of Lal-on, where she was receiued with great preparation, & there taried the coming thither of the king, at that time pacifying the seditions and turmoiles in the inward parts of France. When the king was come, he gladded all men with his presence, and provided that there was a large household, as well of the noblemen and women of Scotland, as of others appointed to the yong quene, which he still increased (as the quene grew more in yeeres) untill such time as she might be married.)

But now to returne to the doings in Scotland concerning the warres there: After that the siege of Haddington was raised by the English armie (as before ye haue heard) the Frenchmen thereupon retired themselves unto Spuskelburgh; and choosing forth a plot of ground for their aduantage, kept themselves within the same. And herewith there came to them fiftene thousand Scottishmen to assist them, so that when the Englishmen came forwards to assaile them, they found them so strongly embattelled, that (whether their commission did not so farre extend, or whether they had no liking of the match) they forbore to set upon them in that ground of so great disadvantage for the assailants, and so returned backe to Haddington; and after homewards, having furnished the towne with new supplies of men, munition, and vittels sufficient.

Here is to be noted, that the English fleet entering into the Forth, was readie to haue aided the armie by land, as occasions might haue bene offered. But the lord admerall perceiving no likelihood of battell by land, toke vpon him to attaine some other enterprises, and first coming to Bzent Island, set certeine ships on fire there, of the chieftest in the river; and saluting the towne of Leith as he passed by with canon shot, he determined to land some of his men on the north side of the Forth, to make some spoile within the countrie of Fife. But John Erskine lord of Dun, as then somewhat diseased, and returned home from the campe, caused such daile and nightlie watch and ward to be kept, that this enterpryse could not be so secretlie conueied by the Englishmen, but that the same was perceiued, and so prevented, that vpon their landing they were forced to retire with losse: and haplie was he that might first get againe to shipboard.

* For James Stewart, brother to the quene (hearing of this tumult) came thither in hast with the common people of saint Andrews, and some other seto citizens which were remaining in the towne, to whome the neighbors about did also ioine themselves, understanding the cause of that assemblie. The English being now come on land, about twelue hundred, stood in warlike sort readie for the battell, and with the feare of the artillerie (which they discharged out of their ships) did easilie cause the rude multitude to flee awaie. But this James Stewart (by litle and litle suppressing the feare of such as fled) did (with such violence) rush vpon his enemies, that forthwith he overthrowe them, put them to flight, compelled them to returne to the sea with great slaughter, when also manie of them (as they fled to their ships) were drowned, besides three hundred that were slaine, and one hundred taken.)

The erle of Shrewsburie being come backe from Haddington vnto Dunglas, order was giuen for the building of a fort there, as in the English historie further may appeare. And in the meane time monsieur de Wesse, remaining in campe at Spuskelburgh, hearing that the English armie was returned homewards, & how diuerse new bands of horsemen and footmen being left in Haddington, were readie to come forth to skirmish abroad vpon sight of the enimie; he toke aduise, to trie if he might gato them forth to their losse, and thereupon was monsieur Dandelot, and the Keingraue appointed to chole forth a thousand of their lustiest footmen, the which with thre hundred horsemen were conueied and laid close in ambush, behind a little hill not farre from the towne.

This done, a few horsemen were gato forth to drat the Englishmen out of the towne to skirmish with them. The Englishmen were no sooner aduised that the enemies were there at hand in the field, but that all their horsemen issued out of the towne backe with certeine footmen, and straight had the French in chase; who retiring, maintained the skirmish, of purpose to make the Englishmen more earnest to come forward. But immediatlie as monsieur de Wesse saw his time, he gaue signe by sound of trumpet to the footmen to breake forth, who together with the horsemen gaue so fierce an onset vpon the enemies, that they were incontinente discomfited; and fleeing toward the towne, were followed by the French euē hard to the walles; diuers were slaine, and above an hundred taken prisoners.

After this, monsieur de Wesse raised from Duthkelburgh, and coming to Leith set in hand to fortifie that towne. The marshall Strozzi, and monsieur Dandelot, with diuerse other capteins imbarcking themselves in the gallie that yet remained, toke their course to returne to France. One of the same gallies (they being eight in number, beside a foist and a brigandine) was taken by an English ship called the falcon, as she passed through the narrow seas at a place named the Southfurlong, she being alone, and (as it chanced) hindermost of all the companie.

After the departure of monsieur Dandelot, monsieur de la Chapelle de Stron remained colonell of the French footmen in Scotland. As for the furnitures on the water, there remained now but foure gallies vnder the guiding of one capteine Bach an Italian, a man of great experience and approved skill. For ye must vnderstand, that before the arrivall of the English nanie & armie to the succors of them in Haddington, monsieur de Wallerie viceadmirall of France returned home with the fleet of ships that had brought the French armie into Scotland. In what sort the lord Greie of Milton afflicted the countreies of Linlithgow and Linlithgow, after the returne of the earle of Shrewsburie, is partly touched in the historie of England.

About the same time, there chanced a mutinie to rise betwixt the Scots and the Frenchmen in Edinburgh, by reason that a French souldier fell a quarrelling with two of the Scottishmen; and falling together by the eares, diuerse Scots that came to depart the strait, would haue had the Frenchman to prison; but other Frenchmen being there also present, would not suffer the Scots to take him awate. Whereupon arose a great tumult and stirre among them, insomuch that there were diuerse slaine on both parts, namely James Hamilton lord of Stanhouse, knight, capteine of the castell, and pꝛouost of the towne of Edinburgh, with his sonne; and master William Stewart one of the quēns seruants, besides sundrie other. For the Frenchmen doubting some contriued commotion against them, assembled together in order of battell in the streets; so that before the matter might be appeased by the capteins that shewed their diligent endeours therein, they had inough to bring it to passe as they wished.

The beginner of this businesse was hanged the same day in the market place of Edinburgh, where he began first to pike the quarell. Monsieur de Wesse, to shew that this variance had not proceeded so farre as the brute thereof gaue forth (for it was rather increased ye may be sure than diminished) undertooke an enterprise in hand to win the towne of Haddington by a canifado, but in what sort they missed their purpose, and how they were well beaten backe, and sent away by the valiant manhood of the English capteins & souldiers then within the towne, ye may read further thereof in the English historie. There were seven score (some say thre hundred) slaine in the bafe court.

10 But now, forsomuch as I haue said nothing of Broughtie crag, thence the lord gouernour raised his siege from thence, ye shall vnderstand, that (as some haue written) shortly after the earle of Argile came thither with an armie of his Irish Scots, and besieged it. But when he saw he could not pꝛesalle, he toke truce with them within for a time, and before the same was expired, there came new succors to the Englishmen: so that the earle of Argile (by reason his people had remained there the full terme of their bounden & ordinarie seruice) was constrained to leaue his siege, and suffer the Englishmen to become masters of a little hill, where afterwards they builded a fort. And now in the latter end of this yere, they purposed also to haue fortified Dundee, and to haue kept the same with a garrison of souldiers; but hearing that monsieur de Wesse with his Frenchmen was coming thitherwards, they auoided the towne of their owne accord, hauing first spoiled the houses, and after set them on fire.

20 The Keingraue with two bands of his Almains, and monsieur de Etanges with his companie of horsemen were sent before, who coming to Dundee, and finding the Englishmen gone, incamped there, staid till monsieur de Wesse was come, that followed at hand with the French footmen. Within two daies after, they going forth to view the fort, were in danger to haue bene caught per they could get backe againe. For the Englishmen and Lance-knights that were there with them (part of Conrad Whennings bands) issued forth, and droue them to retire, not without danger to haue bene distressed, if the Keingraue had not vsed the greater policie in retiring the troupe. To be short, monsieur de Wesse, to stop the Englishmen from entering anie further into the countrie on that side, left seven ensignes of Frenchmen, & two ensignes of Scots within Dundee, with artillerie and pioners to fortifie the towne, & to keepe it in safetie from the Englishmen. This done, he returned to Edinburgh, and sent the residue of his people abroad into the countrie, to lodge in townes and villages here & there, as was thought most expedient, for the better refreshing of them after their long trauell.

30 While these things were in doing, the gouernour of Scotland sent the lord Carneigie knight (and sc. nato) ambassador to the protector of England, which should for ranfome (as the custome is) demand deliuerie of the earle of Huntlee being prisoner: which if he could not obtaine, that then he should request this libertie, that his wife and children might come vnto him into England. Wherevnto the protector answered, that he would not let the earle free, untill the warres were ended: but for the companie of his wife, he was content to grant it for certeine daies; with this pꝛouiso, that he should not withdraue himselfe by anie means from the custodie of Rafe Wane (corruptlie by Lesleus called Wane) who had taken him in the warres. Wherefore, when the ambassador was returned into Scotland, Huntlee was committed to certeine keepers, who should carie him from London to Dordrecht, distant twentie and foure miles from the borders of Scotland. Now whilest the earle both there looke for his wiues coming to him, he thinketh vpon escape, and to come to him, for he

he had agreed with George Mar, that he should write night p'sentlie bying to him thither, two of the stiffest horses that he could get to sle awaite upon them. According whereunto Mar was readie out of the borders of Scotland with such horses as he knew would serue the turne, wherof one was for the earle, and the other was for his man.

The earle prepareth a supper for his keepers, whereunto they were solemnelie invited, and to plaie at cards with him to passe awaite the tediousness of the night. At length (as though he had played through at cards) he left off, but earnestlie desired his keepers that they should continue on their game. During which, the earle (going unto the window, and looking out) did by a secret signe (for he could not well discern anie thing, it was so extreame darke other all the element) easilie vnderstand that all things were readie for his iourne. The earle then doubtfull (being sometime in god hope, and sometime in feare) thought vpon manie things, which he muttered to himselfe: and at length vnderstande (as doubtfull men are wont to do) burst out in these speeches, Wh sorrow, all these things be a hinderance vnto me, the sharpnesse of the winter night, the doubt of my weake force and helpe, the let of an vnknotone way, and the want of a faithfull guide: God prosper the iourne. His keepers hearing him speake to himselfe, asked him what those secret speeches might signifie: to whom the earle (knowing that he was guiltie of his fault) answered, that those words were vsed as a proverbe amongst the Scots: and first had their beginning by the old earle Morton, uttering the same in the middle of the night when he lay in dieng. Whereupon (to the end that his keepers should not haue anie suspicion of his determined flight) he sitteth downe againe to cards.

After which suddenlie he rose from them, as moved by losenesse of his bellie to vnburden nature, by which occasion he forthwith (accompanied onelie with his seruant) leaped forth, found the horses readie furnished for himselfe and his man, got on them, & with speedie iourne did sle to the borders of Scotland. When he was passed over the riuer of Tweed, and had a little refreshed himselfe from the labor of his iourne in the house of Mar, he went the same night (being Christmas eue) to Edinburgh, where he was iustitie & honorable receiued of the queene, the gouernor, his wife, and his other friends, with an vniuersall gladnesse of the whole multitude of the towne. As soone as his keepers perceiued that he was gone, they speedie ran to horse, and (doubtfull which way to follow) they seeke him here, and there, and euerie where, but all in vaine, for the diligence of the earle put them out of all doubt for obtaining him. Whose flight was not onelie a freedom to himselfe, but also to manie other noble prisoners, who (vpon the assurance of his faith and word) were permitted to depart into Scotland. The gouernor therefore, to congratulate with the earle for his returne, ressoied vnto him the chancelorship, and the rule of manie other prouinces which he had before his captiuitie. For which cause when he had remained a while at Edinburgh, he returned to the north parts of Scotland, where speedie and easilie he appeased all the tumults of those people.)

On saint Stephens day at night, the castell of Hume was scaled, and wone out of the Englishmens hands. One of the surname of the Humes, a man of threescore yeers of age, was the first that entered on the wall, being one of the watchmen that kept his walke on that side. * Not long after, when the capteine of Falkcassell had commanded the husbandmen adjoining, to bying thither (at a certaine day) great store of vittels, the young men there a bouts hauing that occasion, assembled thither at the day appointed, who taking their burdens from the horses, and laing them on their shoulders, were receiued (after they had passed the bridge, which was made ouer two high rocks) into the castle, where (laing downe that which they brought) they shewd lie (by a signe giuen) set vpon the keepers of the gates, due them, and (before the other Englishmen could be assembled) possessed the other places, weapons, and artillerie of the castell, and then receiuing the rest of their companie into the same (through the great and open gate) they wholie kept and intoted the castell for their countremen.)

About the same time, the Reinsgrauet returned into France, leaving his five ensignes of Almainis behind him, vnder the charge of capteine Metonze, a good man of warre and of great experience. Also monsieur de Etanges was taken in a skirmish at Broughtie crag, as I haue noted in the English historie: & about the same time, there landed at Dunbarton foure bands of souldiers, Bretonnais and Gascoignes, bringing monie with them to paie the souldiers their wages, behind as then for the space of three moneths. Sir James Willford also was taken about the same time by the Frenchmen, in a skirmish at Dunbar (as I haue also noted in the historie of England.) Not long after, monsieur de Welle was appointed by the queene Dowager, to go vnto Jedworth, to prevent that the Englishmen should not fortifie there, whereof she stood in some doubt.

Immediatlie vpon his comming thither, the lord of Fernthurst requested him to helpe to recouer his castell of Fernthurst out of the Englishmens hands, which they had taken from him and kept, greatlie to the annoiance of all the countrie thereabouts. Monsieur de Welle taking with him monsieur de Wiffell, and monsieur de la Chapelle de Biton, hastied thither with the chiefe part of his armie, sending before certaine capteins with their bands to surueie the house, who at their comming thither, vied such diligence in following the offered occasion, that they both repelled their enemies that came forth to gise them the skirmish, and pursuing them with great rigor, wan the lims of the house vpon them, forcing the capteine and souldiers to retire within the dungeon, and kept them so short therein, that they had opportunitie to mine an hole through the wall, of such largenes, as a man might easilie enter by the same.

Whereunto a great number of Scots hauing broken open the gate of the base court, where the Frenchmen were busie to assault the dungeon, butt in on heapes, vpon desire to be reuenged vpon the Englishmen, and namelie of their capteine, who (as they said) had done them manie great displeasures. The capteine perceiuing this, and doubting if he fell into the Scottishmens hands he should die for it, he presented himselfe at the hole which the Frenchmen had made, and peeked himselfe to monsieur de Wiffell, and la Poudre Rouge, who minding to vse him as became men of warre, would haue led him out of the p'se: but suddenlie a Scot comming behind him, whose wife (as was reported) he had rauished, smote off his head so iust from the shoulders, that it leapt foure or five yards quite from the bodie. Manie other cruell parts the Scots seemed to shew against other Englishmen, taken here at Fernthurst: but they excused the matter by the euill dealings of the Englishmen towards them before that time.

Monsieur de Welle returning to Jedworth, aided by the furtherance and counsell of the Scots, ceased not in occasions of advantage to attempt new enterprises against the Englishmen, as time and opportunitie serued: and among other exploits, the castell of Coznewall (an old house built after the ancient maner of fortiffing) was taken by the Frenchmen; and spoiled of all things worth the bearing a waie. Also captaine Coblos a Frenchman, hauing a band of fiftie light horsemen Scots seruing vnder him, on a night had a faire hand against a number of English horsemen, whome he charged so on the sudden, as he saw them out of order, that he easilie discomfited them, and tooke more prisoners (whome he brought to Jedworth) than he had persons in his companie to assaile them.

A road made by monsieur de la Chapelle de Biron.

Monsieur de la Chapelle de Biron, was sent forth by monsieur de Desse, with the companie of horsemen that belonged to monsieur de Etanges then prisoner, and five hundred footmen beside Scots; to make a road into England: which enterprise he attended in burning towines and villages, and returned without any great losse sustained at that time. Within two daies after his returne to Jedworth, monsieur de Desse dislodged from thence, & taking with him foure field peeces, and all his men of war, entered into England, toke the castell of Fould and burnt it, with ten small villages in the countie thereabouts, situate within halfe a mile ech of other. There was one tower yet parcell of that castell of Fould, which was kept by Thomas Kar, so that the Frenchmen could not win it, for they had no time to staie long about it; remouing that night ouer the water, & incamped there within the Scottish ground.

Another made by monsieur de Desse. Fould castell towne.

As the Scots and Frenchmen executed these enterprises, they were coasted by certaine light horsemen; but neuertheless the Frenchmen returned in safetie to Jedworth, hauing soze indamaged the English borderers by that road: insomuch as it was thought, the Scots (which were with them at that road) gained at that time, by pillage and booties to the value of nine thousand crownes. The Englishmen soze græued, that the Frenchmen lieng thus in Jedworth, should in such wise addresse one enterprise after an other against them, so greatlie to their annoyance, assembled a powter together at Roxburgh, purposing to haue assailed the Frenchmen in their campe at Jedworth.

Scots gaine by spoile.

Monsieur de Desse fleeth out of Jedworth for feare of the Englishmen.

But monsieur de Desse hauing warning thereof, departed from thence first to Melrose, and after further off within the countie, fearing to be constrained to giue battell. Which he could not haue done without manifest losse of his feeble armie, hauing not past fiftene hundred footmen, and five hundred horsemen able to haue done seruice: for such was the miserie, which they had in manner continuallie sustained through want of vittels, and other necessarie helps during the time of their incamping at Jedworth, that what through sicknesse and hurts received in assaults and skirmishes, no small number of them were dead, and manie other so feeble, that they were not able to aid themselves; insomuch that now being got out of danger, they thought themselves happilie escaped.

The miserable state of the Frenchmen in Scotland.

Shortlie after, in the beginning of the summer, the Englishmen armed five and twentie saile of men of warre, the which arriving at the Wasse, nere to the mouth of the Forth, assailed by faire and pleasant words to haue persuaded the keepers of the castell, there standing on the height of a great rocke, to haue yielded the place into their hands. But perceiving their persuasions would not be regarded, they toke their course vp into the Forth, and finding in their waie foure ships of Frenchmen and Scots, seized vpon them as a wished preie: and the morrow next ensuing, at the verie break of day, they came before Leith, and saluting the towne with canon shot, remained there at anchor ten or twelue daies, in which incane while they landed their people at Inskith, and began to fortifie with all diligence. But before the place could be put in any strength, the ships departed from thence backe towards the sea, and left in the Iland foure ensignes of Englishmen, and one ensigne of Italians, to defend the piers, and the Iland against the Scots and Frenchmen, if they should attempt to assaile them.

After the English nanie was thus departed, monsieur de Desse, and the quene mother being at Edinburgh, determined with all diligence to impleie all such forces as they might make about the recovering of the Ile, before the fortifications begun by the Englishmen should be brought to any perfection. Wherevpon, monsieur de la Chapelle de Biron, imbarked in the gallie of monsieur de Villegaignon, resolved forth to view the maner of the Englishmens dealing within the Ile, which he did in such effectual wise, that approaching within harquebuse shot, he brought knowledge with him not onelie of the state and whole circumstances of their buildings, but also of the perfect number of their ensignes, and the qualitie of the men of warre that serued vnder the same.

La Chapelle de Biron.

At that present also, monsieur de Thermes latelie before arrived at Dunbreton with an hundred men of armes, and two hundred light horsemen after the manner of France, and one thousand footmen, was come to the quene, busie now to further this enterprise. She had got together within Leith haue all the botes that belonged to all the creekes & hauens of the Forth: so that on thursdaie after Trinitie Sunday, euerie thing being prepared readie for the purpose, in the morning by the break of day the quene was come to Leith, to see the imbarcking of the men of warre appointed that day to trie what successe fortune would send them. There was no diligence wanting, neither among the Scots nor Frenchmen, to bestow themselves abroad, & the comfortable words of the quene greatlie encouraged them thereto, beholding them, and deuising with monsieur de Desse and the other captains, till they were all set forward.

The diligence of the Scottish quene.

The forwardnesse of the soldiers.

Villegaignon with his gallies passed on before to keepe the Englishmen occupied, so as they should not perceiue the Frenchmens meaning: but they discovering the vessels at their setting forth, concealed streightwaies that was intended: and therevpon prepared to keepe the enimies off from landing, so that vpon the Frenchmens approach, they saluted them with arrowes and harquebuse shot verie hotlie: yet at length by fine force the Scots and Frenchmen got on land, and drove the Englishmen and Italians backe from the sea strond vp to the higher ground, where they stood at defense on a plump together, doing their best to defend the place against the assailants.

Inskith assailed by the Frenchmen.

But finallie, their generall named Cotton, being slain with George Applebie esquire, a captaine of an ensigne of footmen sent forth of Derbyshire, and one Gaspar Bizoni, that was captaine of the Italians, beside diuers other gentlemen, and the most principall men of warre and souldiers among them: the residue were constrained to retire vnto a corner or point of the Iland, where they were taken without further resistance, although before they had made verie stout defense, hurt and slain diuerse Scots and Frenchmen, both at their landing, and also after they were entered on land. Among other, monsieur de la Chapelle de Biron was stricken through the head with an harquebuse shot, and his burgonet beaten so into his head, that his friends that were about him, were faine to conuete him into one of the gallies to be dressed of his hurts by a surgeon. Also a gentleman named Desbozies, which bare the said monsieur de la Chapelle his coronell ensigne, was slain with a pike by the hands of the soynamed Cotton the English generall.

better to conceive of that which they had to do. Although the Frenchmen had leisure to march their horses a maine pace, till they were got out of danger : for after they once beheld all the troops of the English horsemen almost at their elbows, and herewith the battell of the Almains suddenly appearing on the hill top ready to come down upon them, it was no need to bid them packe away.

The Frenchmen retire.

The Scottish light horsemen cunning on the backs of the English armie, perceived where the Almains (to make them ready to give battell) had shrowen off their clothes, and left the same (with all their baggage and stuffe which they had about them) in keeping of none but of their women and boies: whereupon those Scottish horsemen, not minding to suffer such a pzeie to escape their hands, came galloping in, and took all the best stuffe they could lay hold upon, and returned in safetie, before any enemy could come backe to the rescue. The Almains were in no small chafe for the losse of their garments and other necessities; but there was no helpe then to seeke remedie in that behalfe: for the Scots were insensibly and got quite out of danger.

The English armie, after that the Frenchmen were thus fled and gone, passed forth to Haddington, with their carriages laden with vittells, to the great comfort of them within that fortreffe, standing in great necessitie before this conueie came. This summer also, and a little before the vittelling thus of Haddington, vpon knowledge had that Iulian Romero with his band of Spaniards, whereof he was capteine, seruing the king of England, was lodged in Coldingham, six miles distant from Berwick: certeine bands of Almaines and Frenchmen came thither vpon the sudden, and surprizing the Spaniards before they were aware of their appoych, set vpon them in their lodgings, tooke, and slue in maner the whole number of them.

Things passing in this wise in Scotland in the summer of this yeare 1549, the Englishmen were not onelie in the meane time sore troubled with commotions raised by the commons of that realme; but also with the warres which the French king made against them, within the countrie of Boullognois, so that they had not meanes to imploie their forces against Scotland as they had determined to have done; as partlie before, and more largelie in the historie of England is mentioned. By reason whereof, anon after Michaelmas they gave over the keeping of Haddington, and raising their fortifications there, they returned into England to the great reioicing of Louthian, to whome that tolonge had given occasion of great troubles and calamities. Upon the giuing over thus of Haddington, the gouernor and the queene Dowager were aduanced, in hope to recover againe all that the Englishmen held within the boundes of Scotland.

60 But first it was thought good to assaile the winning of Broughtie crag ; for it sounded (as was thought) greatlie to the diminishing of the estimation, aswell of the Scots as Frenchmen, that the English should keepe soot so far within the realme, in despite of their whole puissance. Whereupon monsieur de Thermes about Candlemasse, hauing all things in a readinesse for the siege, came thither, and did so much, what with shot of canon to make bat-terie, and other meanes of inforcements, that gi-uing the assault both with Scots and Frenchmen, they entred the soot the twentieth of Februarie by fine force, so that all those within were either taken or slaine . Whereupon those English also that kept the castell, rendered up the same without further resistance, amongst other prisoners : Sir John Luttrell the capteine was one.

In this meane time there were certeine commissioners appointed betwixt the two kings of England and France to commune of a peace: but because they continued long in their treatie per they could agree, the Scots and Frenchmen surceased not in occasions of advantage to pursue the warre, so that comming before Rowder they besieged that fortresse, & skirmishing with the Englishmen that issued forth, to encounter them, drove them in at the gates with some losse on either part. And this done, the French held them within so straitlie besieged, that if peace had not bene the sooner concluded, Sir Hugh Willoughbie captaine of that fort must needs have perished through lacke of shot, & other necessarie things serving for defense; which were spent, so that they were constrained to use their powder bevell in stead of bullets. But as it fortun'd, a peace was accorded, passed, and confirmed, that verie selfe time betwixt the two kings of England and France, through the diligent and orderlie trauell of the commissioners appointed to deale therein, whose names insue.

First for the king of England, the right honorable John earle of Bedford, knight of the garter, and lord priue seale; William Paget lord of Beaudesert, knight also of the garter; Sir William Peter knight, chiefe secretarie to the said king; & Sir John Mason knight, secretarie to him for the French tong. For the French king were appointed Francis de Montmorency, lord of Rochpot, knight of the order of saint Michaele, and lieutenant for the same king of Picardie, in absence of monsieur de Wandolme; Gasper de Colignie, lord of Chastillon, knight also of the order, and captaine generall of the footmen of France, and the said kings lieutenant generall in the countie of Bullogne; Andrew Guillard lord Portier, knight also of the order, and one of the same kings priue counsell; and Guillaume Bouchetell lord of Sallie, knight likewise of the order, & secretarie of the estate of the finances. [And for the Scots (as saith Lelcus, lib. 10. pag. 506.) D. Painter bishop of Ross.]

Among other articles comprised in this peace, it was couenanted, that all such forts, castels, and places as the Englishmen held in anie part within the Scottish dominions, should be deliuered and restored to the Scots; and that the forts of Dunglas, Korburgh, and Alimouth, which the Englishmen had built and raised out of the ground, should be rased and throwen downe, to auoid all occasions of new controversies that might grow by reason of keeping or defending the same: so as the peate now concluded, might in all points be firmelie and truelie kept and obserued, aswell betwixt England and Scotland, as England and France, and betwixt all and euerie the subiects of the same realmes, both by sea and land. Monsieur de Mourret was sent into Scotland with the copie of this peace, by whose means it was proclaimed anon after Easter about the beginning of Aprill, and euerie thing used and ordered according to the articles of the agreement concluded.

In Maie the Frenchmen and Almaines were im-barkeed at Leith in sixtene French ships, and certaine Scottish ships, and departed from thence into France. A few there were, as Sigropellice and Saint Jalcise, captaines of light horsemen, with others that passed through England, and so home into their countrie. Moreover the marquesse de Daine, after duke Daumals comming ouer into England about the same time for an hostage, passed afterwards through the realme into Scotland, to visit his sister queene Dowager, and shortly after returned.
They mourned both for the death of their father Cland de Lorraine, the first duke of Guise, who deceased the eighteenth of Aprill this present yeare 1550.

As soon when the French departed out of Scotland, there were manie Scots appointed unto them; partlie, to defend them from pirats, if they should offer them anie iniurie in the streit of the Britissh sea, and partlie for honors cause to bring them on their iournie into France. By whose departure Scotland was free lie deliuered from all forren soldiers, except certeine Frenchmen, who remained still in the countrie; because they had the Ile of In-keth and the castell of Dunbar committed to their charge, which afterwards they did most faithfullie discharge. Monsieur de Thermes, Chapellie, and diuerse other captaines of France, remained also in Scotland (after that the others were imbarkeed to be gone into France) for pleasures cause, and to see the countrie; who (trauelling ouer Scotland, and beholding the cities, searching the castels, and marking the bulwarks of defense) did constantlie affirme, that in the whole world they neuer saw forts and townes more pleasantlie placed, or more naturallie defended. In seeing whereof they consumed the time with great pleasure, vntill the moneth of December, in which they all went into France with the queene Dowager.

Thus, as there was peace (by the departing of the French) with forren nations, which continued three yeares: so was there within the wals and kingdome warre and dissention amongst the Scots; which was most perillous and troublesome. For they which were the chiefe rulers (as the gouernor and his brother the archbishop of saint Andrews and others) did vse all things with extream crueltie & conetonsnesse. For the archbishop, being giuen to all libertie, followed by law his pleasures in all things, as though it had bene permitted unto him.
For first, as a presage of his following tyrannie, he permitted the slaughter of William Cheychton to go unpunished, the same William being slaine in the gouernors house (if not within his owne sight) by Robert Semple: next followed the death of John Maluill an old man of life; who next unto the gouernor was most accounted of by him, as chiefest of his familiars. This John had his letters (which he wrote to an Englishman, to whom he did commend a captive his friend) intercepted. In which, although there were not anie suspicion of anie fault, yet was the author of them punished with the losse of his head, whose patrimonie made his death seeme the more vile; because the same was giuen to the younger sonne of the gouernor. The hurts of these wicked parts did pertaine to few, the enemie thereof to manie, and the example vniuersallie to all. For by reason of this unskillfull gouernement of the kingdome, and the slouth of his life, which offended the common people; the gouernor began to be had in contempt almost of all men.

In September following, the queene Dowager accompanied with the earls of Huntley, Castile, Marshall; Southerland; and diuers other of the Scottish nobilitie toke the sea, and sailing to France landed at Diepe: she was conueied thither by the prior of Capod, & Leon Strogie, sent and appoy-ned with six gallies to haue the conduction of her; from Diepe she remoued to Rone, where the king then late, of whom she was right portecouslie recei-ued, and had such attendance and seruice done vnto her, during the time of hir tarriance there, as stood with the dignitie of hir person, and was answerable to the minds and expectations of hir traine; to the high praise likewise of the king and his court in that behalf.

France were, that now having disposed all things at home in Scotland, the might renew the old league in France, the might see his daughter and his other friends; and procure the gouvernement of the realme to his selfe. For the ambitious and subtil woman did thinke in his mind, that the gouernor by his euill demeanour would soon be put out of his office, and that the might easilie find means to be substituted in his place. But before his shipping into France, and whilst they were preparing, the earle of Huntley commanded William Pakintolche (chiefe of the familie of the Glenchattens, and his followers) to be apprehended (for a conspiracie secretlie begun against him, whilst he was the kings deputie in those north parts) and from thence (being first deprivied of all his goods) caried him to Strachbolgie, where he was beheaded. Which fact (greatlie offending the minds of the earle of Castles, and others that fauored the Pakintolche) did so stir them against Huntley, that a commotion and tumult had bene raised by them, unlesse the wisdom of the quene had appeased the furie of their minds.

For although the quene certeine yeares after, had vndone the sentence of proscription for the goods of Pakintolche (restoring the same with the possessions and inheritances unto the sonne of Pakintolche) and thereby had seemed to cut awaie the cause of dissention betwene Huntley and them: yet the kindred and friends of the Glenchattens (not suffering so great an iniurie to their familie to go vnrueged) did secretlie (but eagerlie) pursue the same with great contention of mind. Wherefore entring the castell of Pet by deceipt, they apprehended Lanchlane Pakintolche, and (condemning all his followers to banishment) did cruelle kill him (as the betrayer of the head of his owne familie) because they supposed, that he ministered and blew the cole that fired Huntley, to make the said William Pakintolche out of the waie.

A little before which, the maister of Cresskine, and Henrie Senclere deane of Glasgou were sent into England; who at London did anew confirme the peace concluded before with the English; from whence they passed into Flanders, to make the like league with the low countries, which they did renew, to the great reioicing of both nations; although in the beginning of the treatie there grew great and contentious questions for the restitution of the ships of Flanders and Holland (whereof the Scots had taken manie in the warres) notwithstanding that the Scots had alleged, that they did not offer any violence to those of the low countries, before that they (by the persuation of the English) had offered wrong to the Scots, in detaining their ships and merchandize.

Thus much digressed from the quene Dowagers going into France, whereunto afresh to direct our pen, we say; that being at Rome, the king did there openlie make shew of his welcome unto him by diuerse arguments. Amongst which, this was not the least: that (besides other shewes, honorable triumphs, & manie courtesies shewed to the Scots) calling a chapter of the knights of the order of saint Michael, he admitted the earle of Huntley and other chiefe lords of Scotland deere to the quene, and fauored by him, into the said order. Which honors and pleasures seemed the more augmented, in that the yong quene of Scots was there present, adorned with such singular beautie, as was not easilie to be spoken, by the iudgement of Lefleus. After that they had thus spent some time in delights of courtesie, to feed the mind and eye, the king of France, the two quenes of Scotland, and the other nobles, departed from thence to Paris; where they were with great triumph of the citizens most iustlie receiued. At what time againe, the French king shewed such humanitie to Huntley, and the other Scots; that he seemed for ever most firmelie to bind them vnto him. After that they spent some daies there at Paris, the king with that companie remoued to Blesics; where he remained all the winter.

Now the quene Dowager, thinking the time and place fit for the executing of the cause of his coming into France, and vsing therein the aduise of the duke of Guise, and the cardinal of Lozeine (his brethren) openeth the same vnto the French king, shewing that amongst others, the chiefe cause to take that iournie, was to require his opinion, touching the gouernement of the kingdome of Scotland: and to know, if it pleased him that the helme of the same kingdome should be committed to his rule. Which if he misliked, or deemed the contrarie; that yet the would wholie rest on his determination. The which matter pleased well the king, but yet with this promise; if the gouernor without any tumult or raising of quarrels would giue it ouer.

Whereupon the quene, to bring euerie thing about as she desired, did persuaide the king to confirme the dukedome of Chateleault in France, vnto the gouernor, before granted to him and to his heires; & to make his eldest son erle of Arraine chiefe capteine of the bands of Scots in France. And further, to giue the earledome of Purreie to the earle of Huntley (kinsman to the gouernor) and to his heires; the earledome of Rothleie to his sonne, which had married the kinsman of the said gouernor; the whole earledome of Angus, to the earle thereof; and the earledome of Moriton, to the sonne of George Dowglafe. All which he should procure likewise to be confirmed by such, as should be gouernors of the yong quene. These things now done, the French king carefullie receiued the yong quene of Scots into his protection; untill she should come vnto more sufficient yeares, able to confirme all these gifts; the which if she refused then to doe, the French king would then bestow as large possessions on them in France.

In the meane time the gouernor had sent Carnegie knight and senator into France, who should in the name of the Scots giue great thanks to the king for the aid which they receiued out of France, against the Englishmen. After this the French king did liberallie open the determination of the quene mother of Scotland to the bishop of Rolles (then ambassador for the Scots in France) to Robert Carnegie, and to Calvin Hamilton (to whom, as was said, the abbey of Kilmain was given in commendam) to the end that the same which was at the first secretlie consulted betwene the king of France & the quene Dowager, might now openlie be considered among the Scots which were in France: declaring further, that he desired nothing more, than that the quene mother should suffer the parts and place of the quene his daughter, in the administration and gouernement of Scotland, with the same moelie stood with reason and equitie; and that he (the better to win the gouernor to yield thereunto) had giuen the gouernor the dukedome of Chateleault, to his sonne the capteinship of all the Scots in France, and manie other liberrall benefits to manie other of his kinsmen.

And to the end that no deceipt might be supposed to be hidden vnder this liberalitie, the French king willed the ambassador to take possession of all these things in the dukes name. Robert Carnegie hauing his errand, returned into Scotland; & shortly after, the bishop of Rolles was appointed ambassador, who at length with much adoe did wining from the gouernor a consent to part from his authoritie, and to applie himselfe to the will of the French king: which thus in the end obtained, the bishop of Ross goeth againe into France, to aduertise the king what he had done. Whereupon the king considering his painfull & faithfull seruice, did reward him with the abbeie of Labeie in France.

Blots.

Whilest these things were in doing, Edward the first, king of England, did send the marquesse of Northampton, & other of the nobler sort of ambassadors to Henrie the second, king of France, then so iourning at Blesies, to moue him to giue his daughter in marriage to the king of England. At what time there were manie martiall games and pastimes shewed before the king, in which the English ioining the Scots with them as companions of their sports, did beare a part, and wan the garland (from the others) to their singular commendation. The summer next following, the French king accompanied with the quene mother of Scotland and other of the nobilitie, did with great pompe enter Turon, Anisw, Plants, and other cities of Britaine, which he had not before seene since he attained the crowne. After certaine moneths consumed in those iournies, he returned to Founteinblew.

Lesleus lib. 10.
pag. 512.

But the quene Dowager of Scotland, taking hir courteous leaue and farwell of the French king, hir daughter, & of other the nobilitie, departed from the court, and with easie iournies came to Jamieilie: where remaining a certaine time, she had the pleasant companie of hir mother the duchesse of Guise, and hir other friends to their great ioy: but that she shewed a certaine grieffe (for hir father lately deceased) which somewhat diminished the sweet pleasure of that meeting. Now when the quene Dowager had remained almost 12 moneths or more in France, honorable interteined, bountifullie feasted, louinglie saluted by hir friends and kindred, and having obtained a willing grant of the effects of hir request, the Scots doe vge hir to hasten hir returne into Scotland, preparing at Paris all things necessarie thereunto.

Lesleus lib. 10.
pag. 512.

Wherefore departing thence, and comming againe to Rone, the quene mother moued and persuaded the nobilitie about the taking of hir iourne through England into Scotland. By occasion thereof, loosing their ships from Newport, they passe the seas, and happilie landed at Portsmouth, a famous port of England. The knowledge of which arriual comming to king Edward the first, he presentlie sent thither the earle of Southampton, and the lord William Howard to intertaine hir: who receiued hir with singular ioy and courtesie, and conueied hir through Hampshyre, Suffre, and Surrete (three prouinces of England) to Hampton court, where the king as then remained; from whence (after that she had bene there most honorable receiued) she came along the riuer of Thames to London, and landed at Poules wharfe in the after noone, and from thence rode to the bishop of Londons palace by Poules, and there lodged.

Hir receiuing at the court.

The fourth of Nouember, she rode in hir chariot to the kings palace of the Whitehall, accompanied with the ladie margaret Douglas, the three dutchesses, of Suffolke, Richmund, and Northumberland, and diuerse other great ladies and gentlewomen, both Scottish and English. At the court gate the dukes of Northumberland, and Suffolke; and the lord treasurer were readie to receiue hir. And at hir entering into the hall, the king stood in the upper end thereof, and the erle of Warwike holding the sword before him. She at hir approaching to him, kneeled downe, and he courteously took hir vp, and kissed hir; and taking hir by the hand, led hir vp into his owne chamber of presence, & after into the quenes chamber of presence, where he kissed all the ladies of Scotland, and so departed for a while.

She dined on the quenes side that day with the king, his seruice and hirs comming both together; the kings being placed on the right hand of the table, and hirs on the left. What plentie of all maner of coslie meates and drinks there was, and what rich furniture of plate and all other things was shewed to set forth the feast, it were superfluous to write. All the ladies both of England and Scotland dined in the quenes great chamber. After dinner the king shewed hir his gallerie and gardens, with all other commodities of the place. And about foure of the clocke, he brought hir downe againe by the hand into the hall, where he first receiued hir, and there kissing hir, she took hir leaue, & returned to the bishops palace from whence she came.

* And here I must not forget what Lesleus hath set downe in this place for the defense of his people, in not deliuering the yong quene of Scots to the English, to haue entered the marriage bed of king Edward the first. Whose reasons although they may (the first ground of the warre considered, with the consent of the Scots parlement to that marriage, and the willingness of the English to haue caused them to performe their promise without battell) be well answered, as matters that not verie greatlie defend the cause: yet I will not anie way say anie thing of him (being a man estranged from vs in religion, but learned, wise, of great experience, a faithful seruant to his mistresse, and a graue bishop of Ross) but let them downe plainelie as he writeth them, leaving the same to the iudgement of others, sith I meane not in anie thing to derogate from them, or arrogate vnto our selues more than is due. Thus therefore he writeth.

Fr. Thin.

When the quene (saith he) of Scots was come to London, the king of England sheweth vnto hir his treasure, openeth the monuments, latest abroad the antiquities of the kingdome, and laboured by manie other such kind of means, that he might prepare himselfe a passage (with the open notes of courtesie) to obtaine the good will of the quene. For he after persuaded hir with manie speeches, that she should giue hir daughter vnto him, as it was before decreed by the Scottish nobilitie: which he proueth by manie arguments to be most beneficiall vnto both nations. When on the contrarie part (if she were giuen vnto the French kings sonne) it should not be profitable either to the Scots, which should giue; or the French, which should receiue hir to wife. Therewithall adding this vnto it, that there should alwaies be continuall hatred, and deadlie enimitie betwene him and that person which should marrie hir.

Lesleus lib. 10.
pag. 513.

Whereunto the quene both presentlie and wisely answered, that the cause of hir daughters marriage to be solemnized with the French, was onlie by reason of the protectors of England, which so bitterlie pursued the Scots with such earnest warre as then was made against them. For it was vnadvisedlie done of him, to seeke to compell by force of battell a woman, which is to be allured to the marriage bed with faire promises and flattering speeches. Whereunto she ioined, that the Scots were so behementlie pressed by him, that they were inforced to craue aid from the French: for the more speedie & easie obtaining thereof, they were vged to leaue the yong quene of Scots in France for a pledge. Wherefore she greatly grieued that the matter was so fast knit vp by the necessitie of time, other wise than the Englishmen would haue had it. But yet, she would labor the French king by hir letters and messengers, with all the diligence that she might, to see if hir trauell and furtherance could doe anie thing with him therein.

therein. Thus much Lescus, and so againe to the matter.)

The first of Nouember, the quene Dowager departed from London toward Scotland, riding from Poules through the citie, passing south at Withops gate. The duke of Northumberland, the erle of Penbroke, and the lord treasurer brought hir to Shordich church, and there took their leaue of hir. The duke of Northumberland had an hundred men after him with ianelins, whereof fourtie were gentlemen clad in blacke velvet cotes garded with white, & hats of blacke velvet with white feathers, and chains of gold about their necks. The earle of Penbroke had six score men well appointed also, with blacke ianelins and hats with feathers, and the lord treasurer had an hundred gentlemen and yeomen with ianelins in like maner, well appareled: which three companies of horsemen furnished the streets on either side, from the crosse in Cheape, to Birchen lane end, as the passed that waie.

The shiriffes of London had the conduction of hir to Waltham towne end, where she lodged that night: and in euerie shire through which she passed, the shiriffe, with the gentlemen of the same shire, receiued hir, and gaue their attendance on hir, till she came to enter into the next shire, where the shiriffe and gentlemen there receiued hir: and that order was obserued till she came to the borders of Scotland, and all hir charges for meat and drinks, aswell for hir selfe, and whole traine, as also the prouision for their horses, was borne and allowed by the king. Besides which, (as saith the same Lescus) Richard Shelleie, now maister of the knights of Malta in England, and Edward Dumble baron, were appointed to attend on hir all the waie through England, from London to Edenburgh, where she was honorablie receiued by the earle Bothwell, and the lord Hume. The earle of Huntlee, and diuerse other of the Scottish lords returned home by sea, the said earle landing at Montrossie, about the latter end of December.

* After that the quene was arrived in Scotland, she labored euerie waie to stop all occasion of dissention; and that these bralles which were risen amongest the nobilitie in the time of the warres, and were not yet fullie quenched, might grow no further, to bring the common wealth (alreadie much impaired) into new troubles. Wherefore, by the aduise of the gouernor, of the earles of Huntlee, Angus, and Argile, and by the quenes trauell, the controuersies moued about the archbishopricks of saint Andrews and Glascow, the bishopricks of Dunkeld and Brechin, the abbeies of Aberbrothie, Inchcape, and other benefices, were ended: by bestowing some of them vpon noble mens chyldren, and some vpon such persons as worthilie deserved them.)

Doctor Wanshop, whome Lescus lib. 10. pag. 514. calleth Robert Warhope, a Scottishman borne, archbishop of Armachane, so nominated by pope Paule the third, and after created Legatus a latere by Julius the third, deceased this yeere in Paris, the tenth of Nouember. This man was blind from his infancie, but yet gaue himselfe so to studie, that he was first made doctor of diuinitie in the vniuersitie of Paris, and after attained to such estimation in the court of Rome, that he was by the foresaid popes aduanced (as before ye haue heard.) So that it is to be presumed, that the sufficiencie of his learning, (where to he must needs aspire altogether by the eare) (sith he was quite deprived of the benefit of sight) coupled with other good qualities of mind, were means to preferre him first into the popes fauour, and then to promotion of his bestowing.

This yeere in the moneth of June, the quene Dowager, and the gouernor, went into the north parts of Scotland; and at Invernes, Elgin, Banff, Aberdeen, and Perth, the gouernor sat in iustice for redress of wrongs, and administration of righteous lawes and orders. And afterwards they repaired to the west parts, and sat likewise in iustice at Dunfreis, Glascow, Lanricke, and in other places of that countie, where diuerse were put to their fines for transgressing the lawes, but few or none touched by corporall punishment. Which was but a slender course taken in reforming enormities, and little better than impunitie; though in leuening of the fines (perhaps) a proportion were vsed: for by that meanes manie an offense was redeemed by monie, and iustice was little better than bought and sold, as at a publike mart.

* After this, they returned to Edenburgh, where all things requisite for the establishing of iustice were confirmed by the counsell of the nobilitie, and of the wise senators. Whereupon, when nothing seemed to want for the setting of a perfect peace through all the realme, but this, that certeine of the inhabitants of the east limits (accustomed to spoiles) did by buying booties of cattell from the borders of England, seeme to offer new occasion of warre. At this time, the gouernor goeth to Jedworth, and remoued such magistrats as had negligentlie gouerned their owne prouince, or dispatched the generall affaires of the kingdome: where taking pledges of euerie familie, he made them after that time in better quiet. Whereupon a long time following, there was a mutuall peace betwene England and Scotland. About which time also, the protestants religion making breach into the doctrine of the Romans, there was a prouinciall councell kept at Withquoe, where the Calvinists with their doctrine were condemned and accurssed; and all things decreed in the councell of Trent vnder Paule the third, were established, with manie other needfull lawes made to purge the corrupt manners of the clergie.

In which meane time, David Painter or Painter (for I find both written) being a man of great learning, and famous by great experience, hauing faithfully consumed seuen yeeres in France, in the seruice of an ambassadoz legier, came out of France to Jedworth: where, when he had declared to the gouernor (in the assemblie of the nobilitie) the reason, order, and meane which he vsed in accomplishing of his office; he was greatlie commended of all men. And for that he had so diligentlie, wiselie, & trustilie performed that great charge, he was with great solemnitie consecrated bishop of Ross, in the presence of that assemblie. At which time also, the gouernor did dub into the order of knightshood certeine bozders, who had deserved well of the common-wealth, to the end that their vertue adorned with such honorable recompense, might be more enlarged toward the care of their countie. Amongest which persons so aduanced, these were the chiefe: Cessford and Ferniburk, Andrew Bar of Littleeden, Condoinknols, Greinherdie, Balclenche, with manie other valiant men.)

In this sortie (wherein the gouernor was this the iustice) the quene secretlie trauelled with the lords, both spirituall and temporall, to haue their consents to be regent of Scotland, immediatlie after hir daughter the quene came to sufficient yeeres, and that the time of hir tutorship were accomplished, or sooner; if the lawes of the realme would so permit. And to assure hir selfe of their good will in this behalfe, she contracted sundrie priuite bands with them, making large promises of great rewards vnto euerie of them. To conclude, this matter was so handled by hir and others, to whome she committed the doings therein, that in the yeere following, the gouernor agreed to surrender by the gouernance into hir hands, hir daughter the yong quene being not yet full twelue yerres of age.

The gouernour was promised not onelie a full discharge and a Quietus est of all his doings, as well for receipt of monie, ieiwels, & other things, during the time of his gouernement, but also a confirmation of the heritable gift of the dukedome of Chateleault: likewise an other confirmation of all gifts and restitutions by him made. During the time he had exercised the office of gouernour. And forthwith the quene Dowager sent into France, to get all these things dispatched, with such assurances of writings vnder hands and seales, as was expedient, and to be sent home into Scotland for his securitie in all things.

* But before the gouernour had consented to the quenes demand, there was great contention about the matter: for the well vnderstood that he would not depart with his office, before the time that the yong quene had attained to the age prescribed for hir full yerres. For it is ordeined by the law of the kingdome, that the king shall not remaine any longer vnder tutors, than to the age of foureteene; & the quene (as it is in other women) at the yerres of 12, at which times they may appoint procurators, which shall haue the gouernement of the kingdome vntill their full age. For which cause, the yong quene chose amongst other (as after shall more appere) the quene Dowager to be one: whereupon, the quene Dowager challenged the gouernement vnto hir selfe, for that hir daughter was certeine moneths aboue those yerres of twelue. Against which the gouernour did stillie contend, constantlie affirming that the yong quene did not exceed the age of eleuen yerres.

Whereupon the quene, to take from the gouernour all starting-holes and other shifts, doth vze the custome of that kingdome, and the obseruation of those lawes to be, that they must reckon the yere in which the Scottish king or quene is yet vnborne in their mothers bellie, to be part of that number of twelue or foureteene; in which they may appoint gouernours to rule vnder them. Which the gouernour perhaps did seeme to confesse for the king, but that the same was true for a quene it did not appere; sith it seemeth to be wrought by Gods high prouidence, that the kingdome of Scotland was alwaies heretofore by manie ages gouerned by kings, and that a woman did neuer before this time (especiallie one within age) challenge that kingdome vnto them, although the male line (as appered from the Bruses to the Stewards) descended from the women, haue sometime possessed the sterne of Scotland.

But in the end, saie or do what he could, the gouernour did surrender his place (as after shall more plainelie appere) vntill which time we will pursue the orderlie course of things done in this place: which is, that whilste the gouernour & the quene mother were in this discord for the regentship of the realme, manie seditious persons (taking occasion thereby with hope to scape unpunished) did renewe the memorie of old iniuries. For hereupon it hapened, that manie of the familie of the Hars did (at Edinburgh) with great boldnesse vtterlie slaine Balcleuche the knight. Besides which, the yonger sonne of the lord Ruthwen or Kelven, did publikelie thrust through and slea John Chartrusse a noble and a valiant yong man, for deadlie hatred (as was thought) betwene those two families. Yet it was spred abroad, that the chiefest cause why Ruthwen did kill Chartrusse, was for that Ruthwen (being called into late of law by the other) distrusting his cause, and supposing that it would passe against him by iudgement, had none other remedie to relieue the matter, than that vertie day to kill Chartrusse. Which matter was the occasion of making this law, that whosoener with force or armes did either pursue or abate, recouer or lose in any action, should not onelie be punished for the rashnesse of the fact, but also should haue the matter forthwith (even in that moment of time) iudged against him.]

This yere, the first of Julie, Edward the first of that name, king of England, departed this life, after whom succeeded his sister Marie, eldest daughter to H. Henrie the eight. [Touching whose regiments, sith this historie requirereth matter appropriate vnto it selfe, we will saie little in this place, remitting the readers to the conuenient course of time wherein they flourished and vaded. Whelie this is worthy the noting, that the realme of England was not so much in hir time afflicted with exquisite troubles of barbarous persecutors, to the diminishing of Gods seruants, and the increasing of satans synagog, as it was like to haue triumphed vnder the glorious title of the victorious gospel, if God had not (for the vnworthinesse of the English people) taken the yong king awaie. For the prosperous beginning of his gouernement foretold an happie proceeding, and a blessed ending. But to returne to Scotland.]

* About this time, Thomas Lesle, who (as you heard before) had fled for the death of the cardinall Beton bishop of saint Andrews into France (where he then was imprisoned) being now set at libertie, did priuile conueie himselfe into Scotland. Which vnderstand of the gouernour, he fined all those that had receiued him into their house, & compelled Thomas to flee to Denmarke, for feare that (if he were taken) he should suffer extreme punishment. But when he knew that there was no place of safetie for him in that countrie, wandering ouer manie prouinces, he came at last into England, in the reigne of Edward the first; of whom, with the rest of his companions, he was most courteously receiued, with yerrelie pensions out of the exchequer or common tresurie assigned vnto them for their maintenance, according to their estates.

But after that king Edward was departed the world, they all were also commanded to depart the realme, to whome earnestlie vying that their pensions might be paid to them in an other place where they should remaine) the duke of Norffolke did publikelie say in the councell, that it seemed not iustice, that a catholike prince should paie any pensions to such as had murdered a catholike cardinall. With which answer the said Thomas was almost stricken dead, and being then wearied with the griefe of his exile, went againe into France, and there by king Henrie (by the meanes of the baron Bunsfome, whom this Lesle had sent before to request the same) he was made capteine of the Scottish light horsemen in France. This man did so valiantlie, worthilie, and honozable behaue himselfe in warres, which the French king had (with Charles the sixt then emperor) on the borders of Flanders, that he was alwaies foremost in the front of the battell, to assault the enimie; hoping by that meanes to wipe awaie the blot of the cardinals slaughter, and more firmitie to bind the French king vnto him.

But after certeine light skirmishes (which he happily performed against the enimie) following the battell at Kenton (a towne in Picardie) most hotlie, and drawing nere within danger of the enimie, he was so wounded with a shot, that he could hardlie returne to his companie: but being relieved by his owne souldiers from the hands of the enimie, he was caried to Montreulle, where he shortly after died, greatlie repenting him of his former wicked fact, and greatlie abhorring the other authors thereof, as furtherers of him therein. Towards whom (after his death) the French king was yet so loving (for the singular ingular fortitude of mind that was in him) that he procured all such of his Scots (as returned from the warres with Bunstone) to be received into their owne countrie, and restored to all their goods and possessions.]

In lent all the lords of the realme of Scotland assembled at Striueling, where all the covenants and articles of agreement, betwixt the quene and the gouernor, were perfectlie and fullie concluded, and thereupon a parlement appointed to be holden in Edinburgh, the tenth of Aprill next ensuing: and in the meane time the gouernor deliuered the castell of Edinburgh vnto the lord Erskin to keepe, as it were by waie of assurance for his part, that all things at that parlement should be accomplished, according to the points of the agreement made by full consent. The lords then assembling in parlement at Edinburgh, on the said twelfth day of Aprill, all the covenants of agreement had & made betwixt the quene Dowager and the gouernor were presented & read, touching the dimission and giuing ouer of the gouernors authoritie, confirmed by the quene hir selfe in France, with consent of the king of France hir husband, the duke of Guise, and the cardinall of Lozrain hir curators, with a gift of the dukedome of Chateaufault vnto the gouernor, vnder the great seales of France, and others, to whome it appertained.

After this, there was read a confirmation of the thre estates of Scotland, touching the premisses, in which they bound themselves to warrant the quenes discharge made to him, & to establish him as second person of the realme [& to haue the gouernement of the castell of Dunbarton (as saith Buchanan)] with other things contained in the contract: to the which there in open parlement all the estates subscribed, and put thereto their seales. Which done, the gouernor gaue vp his office of tutorship, in presence of the said estates, the quene mother, & monsieur Dorsell being there present, who receiued the same in the quenes name, at that time remaining in France. And herewith presentlie was a commission shewed, giuen by the quene of Scotland in France, with consent of hir curators, making the quene Dowager hir mother, regent of hir realme: which office she toke vpon hir, and was thereto admitted by the estates of the realme. Then was the parlement newlie authorized in the quenes name, with consent of hir curators, and in name of the quene regent.

* Where is to be noted, that as at the first they which had the administration of the common-wealth vnder the king of Scotland in his minoztie, were first called gardians, and then gouernors: so now began they to haue a new title for the same, to be called regents of Scotland, not before accustomed among the Scots, which name hath euer since remained to all such as execute that place (euen in our age) during the minoztie of Charles James the first, now ruling the scepter of Scotland. In which declaration of things (as before you heard) to the gouernement of the French, the Scots could neuer be persuaded that the castell of Edinburgh should be deliuered to the rule of strangers: fearing that if the quene should die without issue, that then the French would there by tyrannie settle themselves. Wherefore the same was committed to the defense of John Areskine, which he should not deliuer to any, but to one of the order, and of the nobilitie and parlement.

About this time, the quene regent sent George Gordon earle of Huntley to apprehend John Spader (or Spaderac, as saith Buchanan) chiefe of the familie of the Reginaldins, a notable theefe, & one that was fraught with most wicked deeds: which tourne it is supposed that Gordon did not vertie faithfully discharge. Wherefore, when he returned without the dispatch thereof, in not taking of that man, he was committed to prison vntill the day appointed, where in he should answer the cause. Whose friends in the meane time (to mitigate the enuie against him for the same) did spread false rumors thereof, lateng all the fault in the familie of the Cathans: for they said that the same was hindered by them for the malice that they bare vnto the Gordons: which speeches did one lie rise almost vpon this occasion.

Whilest the quene prepared for hir iournie into Scotland, Gordon did cast into prison William (the head of the familie of the Cathans) a yong man liberalitie brought vp with the earle of Spurrete for kindreds sake, being sisters son to the said earle; for none other cause but for that he would not yield him selfe to the protection of him. Gordon therefore grieued at this man, did not thinke it safetie to leaue him free and at libertie behind him, when he should go into France with the quene, although he could find no fault to laie to his charge worthy any punishment. Wherefore (by his friends) he persuaded the yong man (ignorant of all deceit) that he should yield him selfe into his protection and tutorship: for so by that one meanes, both the fame of the one and safetie of the other might be provided for, which the yong man did accordingly lie.

Wherefore Gordon being now lord ouer the life and death of this William, did (dissembling his hatred to him) breake with his owne wife to execute the yong and gillie man in his absence, supposing thereby to transference all the malice which should rise thereof vnto the fact of his wife, as not done by his consent. Which fell out quite contrarie: for when euerie one knew the subtil wit of Gordon the earle of Huntley, and that his wife (a chosen and rare woman) had passed all the rest of hir life within the bounds of womanlie modestie; they were all easilie persuaded, that he alone was author vnto hir of that wicked counsell. Whereupon, Gordon being now cast in prison for that fact, there was (in a councell holden by the regent) great contention and varietie of opinions, touching the punishment which he should haue. For some would haue him banished into France for certeine peares, & some would onelie haue an excessiue mule to be laied vpon him.

Both which opinions were rejected by the chiefe of his intimies, Gilbert earle of Caillies. For he, perceiving by the present state of things, that peace would not long continue betwene Scotland and France; did bitterlie withstand his banishment into that countrie. For he would not haue that man (being so subtille and vncoustantlie witted, proud, and desirous of reuenge; of and vpon such as were emulous, or backbiters against him) to be a firebrand and capteine to those French, who (he was assured, for their insolent pride) would haue warre with the Scots. For although he thought, that of right he ought to be punished, yet he did not iudge, that any domesticall euill was so much, or the punishment thereof should be thought so great, that they should accustom the French to shed the Scottis blood. Wherefore at length his punishment was agreed vpon (as after shall appeare) in renouncing of all his right to the earldome of Spurrete, & other things.

The quene hauing the disposition of all things, did at hir pleasure change all the officers, and made the earle of Caillies treasurer, & Westmost a French man controller; also another Frenchman called monsieur Rubie, keeper of the great seale, as vicegerent in place of the earle of Huntley, who was chancelor; and therein warden; and James Bachill register; and the abbot of Couper keeper of the priuie seale, as saith Buchanan lib. 16. pag. 521. * About the same time Marie the quene of England, and the regent of Scotland, thought good to haue a peace betwene both nations, and that their commissioners should meet to determine all controuersies. At what time for the Scots, were Robert of Rintwardie, and John Wellenden of Acknowle knights: and for the English, were Thomas Cornwallese, and Robert Bowes knights. At what time there were lawes made touching fishing, aswell in the sea, as in certeine other limited riuers; by which all occasions of contention was taken awate from both nations. Richard Porxon, a man of great counsell in prosperitie, and of great stomach in aduersitie, being capteine of Portsmouth castell in England, was at that time cause of the making of this law for the commons; That if anie Englishman from a Scot, or a Scot from an Englishman, did by force take away anie fish that was taken; that he should pate the muld of twentie shillings for the same: beside other punishments of the common law.

Further it was agreed, that whoesoener by force of tempest, or for anie other cause, were driuen into Scotland or England, he should not by anie pretense be staied; but he might frelie by land or sea, either on horsebacke or on foot returne home. Provided, that he had the testimonie of the next maister of the port, or of the next towne, to witnes the cause of his arriuall; and that during the time of his abode in such a countrie, he attempted nothing against the lawes of the kingdome. Not manie daies after this, Henrie Sinclair deane of Glasgou, senator, and vicepresident of the high court, did returne into Scotland out of France; being a man greatlie familiar with James the sixt, aswell for the singulartie of his wit, as the excellencie of his learning.

But in the time of the gouernour, the courtiers (not greatlie esteeming such wise dome & learning) made no account of him, although the quene Dowager, and diuerse of the nobilitie held him in great hono; aswell for his deepe studie in the best arts, as for his rare knowledge of the publike lawes and antiquities of Scotland. This man, vpon his first returne, was forthwith both autho; and persuader to and of the bishop of the Orkades chiefe president, and to the other senators; that there should be new lawes made for the short ending of lutes in law; for the obseruation of a right course of iudgments, and for the taking awate of all euill customs. In the making & tempering whereof, he was of so great iustice; that such things as were set downe in the law, were more holie and perfectlie brought to their ancient forme than they had bene before.

The reason is readie; to wit, aswell for that in equall deliuering law to all men: as in pleading, there was by his meanes more diligence used by the magistrats, aduocats, scribes, and officers; in cutting awate vaine and superfluous formes and orders: which ministred occasion; that their sutes did long hang in court, before they could be determined. At this time also the marquesse of Maigne (being after made duke of Almaine) who in the meane time with manie other nobles of France, had remained pledges in England, did (hauing licence therevnto) come into Scotland to see his sister, accompanied with sir Thomas Stetokleie of England notu knight; who after he had remained some daies with his sister in pleasure & delight, discharged his faith, and returned againe into England.]

Secondlie, that the inhabitants meeting together, should no more assemble vnder a certeine colour of gaine, which for exercise of the bodie (as it was supposed) was holden after the example of one (I can not tell who) Robert Wood a wild or vplandish man. In the verie same yeare 1555, in the eight hundred and eighth of August, fell the mariage of Marie quene of England with Philip king of Spaine in the citie of Winchester. Wherefore ambassado; were sent from the quene regent to Philip and Marie, to congratulate their mariage. Besides which, these ambassado; did require a renewing of the league, and that commissioners should be appointed to meet the next summer in the borders, to end all controuersies. In the meane time, whilest the quene regent did administer the affaires of South Scotland, John Stewart earle of Atholl was sent into the north parts with a chosen compante, to breake the force of John Spudiard or Spudrace. At what time this earle bled such courtesie and counsell in pacieng, and such celeritie and wisdom in executing of things; that he brought the seditious Spudiard (impatient to haue anie gouernour) to the quene, to whome the said Spudiard did willinglie yeld himselfe, his children, and his kindred.

To which man, the quene (in respect of singular clemencie, and pietie to all men, according to the disposition of his nature) did wholie remit all his offenses, with this condition; that he should faithfullie remaine prisoner in the castell of Westens, and in the towne of Perth. But as the for (as the proverbe is amongst vs) cannot liue without his starting holes; so this Spudiard and his companions, imbued with more than forlike conditions, did (deseruing their keepers) returne to their olone causes, and afresh trouble all the north Scotland with their raised seditions and spoiles. Which things inforced the quene, that she did go into those parts, to hold iustice of oces: in which she might bide the evils of wicked men, and purge those prouinces from all the roots of sedition.

Wherevpon, in the moneth of Julie, the quene accompanied with the earles of Huntleie, Argile, Rothes, Castils, and Marhall; the bishop of Aberdeen and Ross, M. Doffell, Rubie, and others, went to the towne of Inuernesse, in which citie the faults known by publike accusation there was iust punishment taken vpon the offenders. And because there were manie hidden in the higher and mounteine countries, which by their absence fled the punishment, she commanded the heads of the mounteine families, that they should bring their guiltie countreymen and kindred to iudgement, according to the law established by James the sixt; with a great paine pergine set upon the chiefe of those families: if the other did stidie resist, & would not come into iudge-ment: whereupon it followed, that hundreth of diverse families, that were in contempt departed a waie, did come to publicke judgement, where manie and thole not of the meanest sort, were the punishment for troubling the peace: amongst which some Grant a baron being committid to prison, and some Grant and others others, had persons before the iudges, did promise to bring their dead bodies: when they could not take their live bodies. The earle of Cathnes also for cause that being warned therunto, he did not bring his people before the iudges, was first committed to prison in Inverness, then at Aber-den, and lastlie at Edinburgh, from whence he was chased his libertie with a great masse of monie.

Macbride in like sort, head and chiefe of the tribe of Strathnauerne of Glencone, being called to iudgement (for that he had often wasted the countie of Southerland next adjoining) did contemne the precept: whereupon the queene provided a great armie, which under the erle of Southerland brake into Strathnauerne, where he possessed all the places of doubt, least anie hole might be left for the theues to passe a waie from thence. Whereupon Macbride, when he saw himselfe so beset (as that no place of flight was left him) perloped himselfe to Hugh Ben-die, who led him to the queene, by whom he was committed together at Edinburgh a long time, but they of Glencone put in pledges, & (being committed to safe and strong prisons) were referred to the iudge-ment of the queenes pleasure.

After this, the queene leaving Inverness, and progressing the province of Ross, she came to Elgine, Banff, Aberdeen, and the chiefe places thereabouts, diligentlie to inquire of the misdeemeanors of those people. At what time she did temper the rigor of law with such courtesie, that she punished the offenders by fine, and not by death: From thence she came to Dundee, and to saint Johns town, observing the same cause and course of hir coming.
When she had thus passed over the summer in bringing the mounteine people to their dutie, she sent the earle of Huntlie to joine with the bishop of Ross and Breneis, and to Hugh Benedie; to whom she did substitute a better and more commodious forme of dispatch of their affaires by others: who should receive the libels and accusations of private persons, and diligentlie to inquire of them, in the townes of Inverness, Elgine, and other places.
By whose diligence it came to passe, that all those counties (being reduced to the rule of iustice) were made the more quiet.

Here I will not (saith Lesleus) now declare how honourable & sumptuouslie the queene in all hir pro-gresse was received (without anie charge to hir) of the pères, bishops, and other nobles and gentlemen of Scotland, sith the Frenchmen (which were then present with hir) have opened to other nations as well as to their own people (with singular commudations to the Scots) the gorgeous shew of this Scotland, being a most wortheie signe of the fauour they bare to the queene. In the meane time there were sent commissioners to the borders, as the bishop of Dunblane, the lord of Lethington, & master James Macgill: where doctor Tunstall bishop of Durham, & certeine others for England met them at Duns, and remained there till the queenes com-ming backe forth of the north in September next following.

This yere was a parlement holden, in which the lords Binning, Dinnison, and Orange, with matter Henrie Balnauers, and others, which were for fasted in the gouernors time, were restored. At the same time the queene, by the counsell of monsieur Doissell, and Aubie, and certeine of the nobilitie of Scotland, requested that a new order might be made, whereby euerie mans substance should be put in an inventarie, and according to the rate thereof to paye a peneltie taxation, to be put and kept in the treasurie-house till warres began, and that then men of warre might be waged, therewith to lie upon the borders, and more in that case to be charged to come from their home houses, and then anie great armie came south of the firth to invade Scotland.

A hurdle of the great lords were agreed to this ordenance; but the most part of the barons hearing thereof, assembled together in Edinburgh, to the number of two hundred & above, and sent the lords James, Sandilands, of Calder in Louthian, and John of Wemyss in Aife, to the queene and lords, beseeching them not to let such new taxations upon them, for they could not draw such burdens; but would defend the realme, as before time their elders had done, not meaning to put their goods to towne-tare, as if they should already make their last will and testaments: and be past all hope of inioyning their temporall goods, as persons not to live longer in the world, but to take their farewell, and give ouer all that they had by laie of fatal necessitie not to be avoided.

Adding further, that their elders did not onlie defend themselves, and their goods against the English, when they were of farre greater power than they now be; but did also manie times make further invasion upon them in to their owne countie: For which cause, they being not anie lot now so degenerate from their ancestors, that they would not when need required, bestow to their substance and life in defense of their countie.

And as touching the hired souldiers, it was a thing full of danger, to commit the state of Scotland to men without substance, or without hope of advancement, and to such as for manie will bare so deanie thing, being a thing apt to kindle their deape contentnesse, and to minister occasion to them to attempt other matters. But to the end all other things may the better be looked vnto, let them more remember the deerenes of their countie, than their owne estate or condition. For will anie man believe, that hired souldiers will more valiantlie fight for strangers, than the owners will fight for the defense of their owne? That a little hire or wages readie to be abated in peace, will greatlier incense the minds of the common people; than gods, children, wives, and temples, will moue the hearts of the nobilitie?

Whereunto may be ioined, that this matter pertaining to the highest god of the kingdome of Scotland, and that the same is of farre more importance than that it should be communed of at this time, and in the tender age of our yong queene. Besides which the greater part of men do suspect and feare, that the same new order for warre is impossible, and such as cannot be performed without some commotion of the Scottish nation, especiallie sith so great sums of monie can hardlie be wrought out by tribute imposed on the same Scots, as may suffice to nourish a hired armie to defend the borders. Wherefore it is to be feared, least the end of persuation grow to this point, that it do not rather open a gap to let in the nimie, than to be a barre to keepe them backe. For if the English, after this example, being a farre richer nation, shall gather a much greater summe: who doubteth, but that they may with lesse trouble to the comon people, raise an armie twice as great as that of the Scots, & such as shall not onlie enter the borders, but rush even into the verte bowels of the king.

kingdome of Scotland.

For the other part of the nation, I cannot tell whether it be better to suppress it in silence, or to deliver it (saith Buchanan) to common eyes & eares. For I doe heare (writeth he) manie which doe murmur and aske who shall gather this monie? How much thereof shall be necessarie to and for the hired soldiers, and how much to be left in the hands of the reedsiners? There be manie things which play in great hope, that no such thing shall be established for the especiall goodnesse and temperance of that worthy prince (in whose hand the whole government now resteth) doth incourage us, that we shall not be so taxed. But yet when we remember the outward debts of others, and our owne at home, which haue before time bene done; we cannot so gouerne our selues, but that we must feare the same hereafter to fall vpon vs, which we haue already felt.
 But letting these things passe, which perchance we haue feared, let vs come to those things in which our ancestors did place their whole helpe (for maintenance of their libertie) against the weapons of their aduersaries: Robert the first, who was in comparison of whose none of the Scottish kings were counted wise, and without doubt none more valiant, as we all confesse, did not onely profit his subiects whilst he liued, but also after his death: For when he was at point to surrender his life, he gaue this admonition, that we should neuer make continuall peace, nor long truce with the English. For that man (by nature and by vse of long time exercised in both forwarres) did well perceiue, that such a willed in idleness and sloth, had their stomachs and minds abated, and their bodies weakened with delights of pleasures, and that covetousnesse and lecherie did spring vp as it were in unfiled ground, when seuer discipline and sparing was quenched, which made them also to be impatient of labor, and to hate battell, whereby their strength being diminished, they should easilie giue place to their enemies.
 After that these two noble men had said thus much, the regent fearing tumultuous insurrections if he persevered in this exaction, lest off anie further to pursue this far, and is (in often acknowledging his error) said to haue used this speech; That some of the best of the Scots, and not the, were authors and workers of the same. By which words manie supposed that the ment the earle Huntley, a man of a sharpe wit, latelie deliuered out of prison, and rather ready to reuenge the iniurie receiued by re-stituent of his libertie, than mindfull of anie benefit thesed vnto him in his deliuerance. Therefore when he saw the regent bent to this one thing to inure the Scots with taxes and payments of monie: and fearing least his power being overmuch increased, that the would abate the strength of the nobilitie, diminish their authoritie, and call the whole government of Scotland into the hands of his people, it was supposed that he gaue his counsell answerable to his disposition for the gathering of monie which he had then in hand, being in deed the part of an enemy to him, because he knew that the Scots would not paie anie tribut, nor be so obedient vnto him as they had bene before. There were also some that supposed this deuise to grow from David Painter bishop of Ross; for he being a man of rare wit, and no lesse learning, was with manie benefites tied to the Ha-miltons, and was not anie waie estranged from their counsels and kinreds.

In this yere, an ambassador of Spalcoine going into England with a great ship, & another bote, was cast on land by sudden tempest of the sea in the coast of Bachquane, a prouince in the north part of Scotland; who having lost all his goods by this wrecke, some time himselfe, and some of his companie, became the lighted on a rocke, where he & they might save their liues. The inhabitants did liberally receive this strange man, and brought him to dwell with them, who would not permit him to want anie thing so long as he remained with them, but they desired him to be returned, that his goods might be restored into the hands of the people, who he had lost. And so he was gaue, who nothing more desired, than to be restored to his companie, which he did.

This yere also in the moneth of Iulie was Robert the first sent ambassador (from Anna wife of Albert, duke of Burgonie, and Desheren, and earle of Genden) out of ball of Pisa into Scotland, to request that the alliance betweene of all yembred yeres made be-twene the Scots and the people of Genden (which by course of some yeres past, was now of no force) might now againe be renewed. Which being granted, & solemnely established, both those nations from that day did liue together in mutuall & perfect friendship. After this, warres arising betwene England and France, quene Marie of England, fearing least the Scots would be stirred at the motion of the French, to attempt something against England, sent ambassadors to the regent, to require that some of the Scots might with his people meet on the borders, to treat of matters belonging vnto them.

Whereupon in the moneth of Iulie, the procurators for both the kingdomes met at Caerleill, whither for the Scots came Robert Reid bishop of Arkneie, Henrie Seintclere deane of Glasgow, Robert Carnegie knight, senators, and the lord Harries, at that time president of the west borders. For the English did come Tunstall bishop of Durham, the lords Dacres, and Wharton; amongst whom there was talk of peace, and recompense of such iniu-ries as were committed by both the nations. In the meane time a certaine Frenchman landed at the west part of Scotland, and declared to the quene the warres betwene England and France, desiring her to make warre vpon the English. Whereupon the quene sent for the lords to commune with them at Perth, where she opened to them divers things done on the borders by Englishmen, and how no redresse could be got: wherefore she required that warres might be moued against England in reuenge of those iniuries, although the bishop of Arkenie was the same time at Caerleill in talke with Tunstall bishop of Durham and others, commissioners for England. The principall cause that moued the quene regent to seke to make war against England, was for that the Englishmen aided the Emperor in fauor of his sonne king Philip against the French king, because their quene had taken to husband the same king Philip, and sent the earle of Denbroke ouer with an armie to aide king Philip's power.

It was thought therefore, that if the Scots inuaded the English borders, it might cause them to call backe their power forth of France to defend their owne countie. But the Scottish lords would not consent in anie wise to begin anie warres: which their dealing when monsieur Doilell perceiued, he speedily went to Hatmouth beside Berwicke, and fortified the same with all diligence, making inuasions into England. Whereupon the Scottishmen in their owne defense were constrained to make warre, and the earle of Huntley was made lieutenant vpon the borders, who came thither; and remaining there by the assistance of the Frenchmen, made sundrie inua-sions and roves into England, burnt diuers townes and villages, and cast downe manie stone houses, piles pieces and strength.

In this meane tyme were the Scottish countie-mers at Caerleill; and the matter of Spawell was den of the west borders, being there with them, with much adoe got a way and came home into Scotland.
The quene assembled a great armie out of all parts of the realme, the which came forth to helpe in the moneth of October; where the quene's French men persuaded them to enter by invasion into England. But they meaning to take further advise, passed over to the west of Spawell hagh, where they encamped, and afterward approached the castell of Marke, involving the same with a siege for the space of two or thre daies. Capteine Head at that present had charge of that castell, with three or foure hundred footmen, and one hundred horsemen, meaning to care little for the Scottish men's forces.

The earle of Westmerland, being then lieutenant of the north parts, gathered such power together as he might make, and came to Louthie; accompanied with the lord Talbot, sir James Crofts, and others, to succor where most need should appeare. The Scottish armie, perceiving the Englishmen thus in a readinesse to resist their attempts, took advise to gether, and concluded that it was not for the weale of the realme, at that time to hazard battell forth of the bounds of their owne land, their princeesse being absent, and as yet in her minority; considering also that the war was not taken in hand for their owne quarrell, but for the pleasure of France. These and other the like reasons, being alleged by the earles of Arche, Huntlye, Argyle, Cassils, and others, to the quene and French capteins, they were nothing satisfied therewith; but the Scottish lords would attempt no further, but retired backe and scaled their armie.

In remouing from Marke, they were pursued by certeine bands of the borderers, and others, which were repelled, and stood in danger to have bene destroyed, if capteine Head had not with noble courage assisted forth, and in time relieved them that were retiring: whereby they staid and gaue a new charge, in which as the Scots were beaten backe againe, and chased ouer the water to their maine armie that was already passed ouer. The quene and monsieur Doissell, perceiving that they could not get the Sco-tish lords to make any further exploit at that present, they retired home; but Doissell with his French men were appointed to remaine still in Hainmouth, to countergarrison the Englishmen within Berwick.

There were diuerse lost bands of Scots waied by the French king, which were appointed to lie in places about the borders, as at Hells, Rockesburgh, and such like for defense of the countrie, and the annoyance of the Englishmen, as occasions might serue. After this, sir Andrew Har, and diuerse other entered England with a power of men about Spar-tinnasse. Nevertheless, the earle of Northumberland, being then lieutenant of the north parts of England, and lying on the borders, assembled his forces together, & coming to encounter the Scots on the very border's side nere to Chemot, at the first the Englishmen were put to the worse, but yet at length the Scots were ouerthrowne and chased: sir Andrew Har, and manie other being taken prisoners.

Sir John Foster bare himselfe verie valiantlie at this encounter, so that his seruice might not well haue bene spared. He was thrust through the mouth into the necke, and also through the thigh; moreover, his horse was slaine vnder him. The conflict was sharpe, for both the horsemen and footmen came to make proue of their forces. The warre thus being began and fallowen, the Scots kept their quarters tyme, and euerie noble man (as he was appointed) lie on the borders with a thousand horsemen; during his ordinary seruice. And on the other side, the English borders were furnished with like supplies of men of warre, so that there were double robes and succours made by the parties to the great damage and spoile of the towne and villages situate adre to the confines of both the realmes.

In December the quene assembled a parlement at Edinburgh, where (the night following the French) she read forth the letters of Henrie king of France, to be read by the whole assemblee, touching the solemnization of the marriage betwene the young quene of Scots, and the French kings sonne, which I haue here set downe.

The substance of the letter of the French king concerning the ma-riage of his sonne to the quene of Scots.

Entie by the grace of God, king of the French, to his worthy conlines & princes of Scotland, and to the rest of the orders, being our deere friends, greeting. It is most plainlie knowen to all nations, how fast a bond both alwaies hitherto remained betwene Scotland & France. Neither can it be hidden that these signs of amitie were, being for number manie, for great-nesse large, and for dutie of friendship mutual ech to other; by which the kings our ancestors haue seemed to confirme; and as it were to increase this amitie, to the end it might remaine whole and sound for euer: yea and so farre the theys thereof hath appeared, that all the benefites of either realme haue seemed to be common to ech other. Which bond of friendship we also haue (for the tyme in which we first receiued the ensignes of our kingdome) labored firmelie to retaine, to the end the same should not any waie be decaied or broken. The which in like sort we well understand, that you haue likewise abundantly performed vnto vs.

Wherefore (more stronglie to knit the same) we will not suffer this opportunitie (which the diuine goodnesse hath laied before vs, as we verelie suppose) of marriage to be solemnized betwene our son the Dolphin, and your quene our deere and sweet sister and daughter. Which thing (after that it began to be intreated) was byged by all parts, as the young quene was vpon that condition left with vs, when she was caried into France, by the consent of our sister the Dowager, and the gouernor of Scotland, to the great reioysing of all you that yelded thereto; where now she hath attained such beaultie and number of vertues, partlie by the liberalitie of nature (which she receiued from the kinglie blood of hir parents) and partlie by the instruction of my wife, that I can hardlye any longer suffer (in respect of the age of my sonne) that this marriage (which we haue so much desired) should any longer be deferred. And sith at Christmasse next my son shall come to those yeeres, in which he may promise all things that shall be necessarie for the knitting vp of the marriage; and sith also we haue determined (if it so seme god to the quene hir mother, and to the rest of the parlement of Scotland, which we earnestly request at your hands) that the marriage shall publike lie at Paris (on the day consecrated to the thre kings) with such ceremonies as is requisite, be fullie consummate with the speech of my sonne and of your quene:

We do by these letters request you, that by common consent you forthwith send some of your chiefe present, but allow more abundantlie with great plea-our and your people, of France and Scotland, shall be so firmly conjoined (as we hope) by this mutual knot of marriage, and our affairs with yours, and yours with ours, shall hang the one upon the other, as it were by a certaine mutuall linke and knot, that both we (being out of the danger of such as would divinitie and overthrow our states) shall for ever in-joy such quiet as we did never hope to do before this.

Upon the reading of which letters in the parliement, by the consent of the whole estate, there were elected and chosen James Beton archbishop of Glas-cow, Robert Read bishop of Dherme, George Le-lie earle of Rothes, Gilbert Kermedie earle of Cal-fles, James Stewart prior of saint Andrews [the queenes ballard brother] George lord Seton [capteine of Edinburgh] James Fleming, and John Crichton lord of Dunn [governor of Montrose] ambassadors and commissioners to go into France, and there to contract marriage betwixt Marie queene of Scotland, and Francis Dolfine of France: and to solemnize the same marriage. Whereupon, sufficient commissions and instruments were made to them by the estates of the parliament, and they accepting the same, made preparation for that iourne, and departed in the moneth of Februarie forth of the rove of Leith, and with great winds & boisterous stormes came into France, losing in their iourne one of their ships, with men and horses before saint Ebbes head, in the Forth of Scotland; and an other with great riches & manie gentlemen, with the capteine called Waterton in the rove of Bullongne.

The ambassadors themselves nevertheless escaped, and coming safe unto the French court in the moneth of March, were honorably received of the king at Paris, where the contract of marriage was made; and that score thousand franks assigned in dowrie to the queene of Scotland, & thirtie thousand franks of yerelie pension, with manie rich jewels.
 There was also a perpetuall bond of league concluded betwixt France and Scotland, and great preparation made for the marriage, which was solemnized in Paris with great triumph and assistance of all the cardinals, dukes, earles, barons, lords, and bishops of the realme, in the church of Notre dame, the 24 of April in that present yere, 1558.

After the solemnitie of this marriage, the legats of Scotland were called into the counsell-house of the French king: at what time the chancelor of France delt with them, that they should represent the crowne and scepter, and other ornaments of the kingdome, to the end the husband of the yong queene might be crowned king also of Scotland. Whereunto the ambassadors did shortly make answer, that they had no such thing given in charge to them. After which, the cardinall said: We desire nothing more at your hands at this time; but that which lieth in your power to performe; which is, there none to confirme by writing that hereafter, will, forsooth, approve, and keep the same bond (which now we have here signed) made betwixt the Dolfine, when the same shall be taken out in the parliament of Scotland. Which request (when returned full of impudence) they supposed best more to constantie and charpelle to returne answer for they answered, that their ambassage was confined within certaine bounds, which they neither could nor would exceed. But and if they had bene sent with free libertie of their ambassage, that yet it were not the part of faithful friends (as the French professed to be) to require that which could not be granted without certaine and assured danger and infamie of treason; though danger of life were absent from it. All which notwithstanding, in all honest things which might well be granted, they would yield unto the French, joined unto them by so manie necessarie occasions. Wherefore they requested the French that they would not in their demands exceed the limits of modestie. Whereupon the ambassadors being dismissed from the court, some of the chiefe of them (before they departed home) which were these, Gilbert Kermedie, George Le lie, Robert Read, and also James Flemming, all men of singular vertue and lone to their countrie, besides manie other of the companie, died there, not without mistrust of poison. It was also be-lieued, that James the queenes brother had received the same daunt: for (although he were of a better composition of bodie, stronger constitution of complexion, and of more youthfull strength, whereby he escaped death) he had alwaies after a continuall and dangerous infirmite of his bellie whilst he lived; of the death of all which shall be somewhat more said hereafter. Thus leaving the Scottish lords ambasadors there in France for a time; we will returne to shew what happened betwixt the Scots and English men at home, where the warres were pursued, to the losse or little gaine of both parts.

About Whitsonday, sir Henrie Perrie with diverse bands of the countrie garrisons, & sir George Wolnes then marshall of Berwike, with sundrie bands of the garrison of that towne, passed forth into Scotland; they being in all about seven or eight hundred horsemen, and two thousand footmen. They burnt the townes of Duns and Langton; and having got together a great number of cattell, returned homewards. The Scots that laie in Kelso, and other places, keeping their quarterage on their borders (for the realme, as ye have heard, was quartered, euery part keeping their turne, as the manner is) assembled together to the number of two thousand horsemen (or few lesse) and three bands of footmen, halting forth to defend the countrie. And perceiving where the Englishmen were, followed and coasted them as they returned with their bodie, till they came to Swinton, where they overtook them, and skirmished with them sharplie as they were passing through the towne.

The Scottish footmen beat backe part of the Englishmens shot into their battell, and pressed vertie forward in hope to be assisted by their horsemen, the which (as ye have heard) overmatched greatlie the English horsemen in number: but the fight grew somewhat hot, and the more unto the disadvantage of the Englishmen, for so much as their shot & polder began to faile them, by reason the mistie morning had made much of their powder dankish, so that they could haue no vse thereof. But herewith sir Henrie Le lie, capteine Read, and others, being in the battell, behaued themselves vertie stoutlie, causing the the footmen to state, and holdie to abide the same: & herewith procured the horsemen to give a charge in such convenient time, as if the same had bene protracted, it might have turned verie unill to the English side.

But now as well the horsemen as footmen playing their parts, the Scottish horsemen abiding without the rowle in troope (while their footmen were in skirmish) fled awaie, leaving their footmen to be slaine and spoiled of the Englishmen, and yet those footmen fought it out right manfully: so that if the Scots horsemen had done their parts so well as the footmen, it was like to have gone hardet on the English side than it did. But now the Scottish horsemen not entering the fight, their footmen were inclosed by the Englishmen: for those that were in the foreward, and were passed by, returned and coming behynd their entrees, holpe to beat them downe, so that few or none of the Scots or Frenchmen (whereof there were some few amongst them) escaped, but were either taken or slaine.

Amongest others, capitaine Calhane, and capitaine Benedie, two chiefe leaders of the footmen were taken: diuerse of their horsemen also in the retire were taken, amongst whom William lord Beith, sonne to the earle Marshall of Scotland was the chiefe. But this victorie was not attended with out losse of diuerse Englishmen: Amongest other one Pell, ensigne-braver to sir John Sparkeham's band of footmen was slaine. Also master Crington a capitaine of light horsemen was taken prisoner by the lord of Comynston, at the first charge given by on the Scottish horsemen, and led awaie without rescue. Beside the manfull prowesse of sir Henrie Persie, and the other English captains before mentioned, the forward valiantie shewed that day of sir William Breerton, and Thomas Sparkeham, that led his father sir John Sparkeham's band of footmen, also of Kase Ellerhar a capitaine of horsemen, are not to be forgotten, who with diuerse other captains & souldiers behaved themselves in such wise at that present service, as their dealings therein deserue speciall memorie.

Moreover, at an other time the Scots & Frenchmen entring into England, the Scottish horsemen, to the number of a thousand or thereabouts, passed forth to burne and forraie the countrie: but the earle of Northumberland, & his brother sir Henrie Persie, assembled together a power of horsemen: and sir Henrie Persie meeting with them at Grendon, set vpon the Scots and chased them over the water of Twissell, vnto the foot battell of the Frenchmen: who retiring to the river of Twed, passed over the same at Chapell Fould, where they were assailed both by certaine foot bands of the garrison of Berwick, that were come forth to aid the earle, and also by the horsemen: so as diuerse were drowned in the river before they could get over.

But after they were once got to the further side, they put themselves in order of battell againe, and retired in a squadron verie stronglie, sustaining little or no hurt at all, notwithstanding that the earle of Northumberland (being then come) and his brother sir Henrie Persie, with the rest of the captains and gentlemen of the countrie, pursued them over the water for the space of two miles, skirmishing with them still as they marched awaie, but could doe them no harme, because they kept themselves in so good order, & the English footmen were not able to reach them. Wherevpon the English horsemen suffering the Frenchmen to depart, left them, and passing into the countrie, burnt long Ednam, and diuerse other hamlets and villages, and so returned. Diuerse Scots that day at the ouertizow and chase of their horsemen were taken prisoners, as the lord Greie, and others.

And after this, the Englishmen won the strong pils of Catonsills, wherein were situate Frenchmen that defended it for the time verie stoutlie, so that it cost the lues of diuerse Englishmen, before they could take it. Shortly after, there was a foie skirmish at Haldon hill. For whereas the most part of summer it was ordeined, that euerie daie certaine bands of souldiers should ward on the same hill; to giue libertie to the inhabitants of Berwick, to mow and carie in their haie; they continued for a time without any trouble offered by the Scots or French, so that the warders standing in no doubt of the enemies, vied out of their armour to shoot, bolle, quat, & exercise such like games of pleasure. Whereof the Scots & Frenchmen being aduertised, came one day from Almouth in so secret wise, that they were drawn verie nere to the Englishmen, yet they had any learning of their approach.

This approach as it was private, so was it likewise sudden, insomuch that before they could be got into order, the Scots and Frenchmen were almost at their elbows; and falling in skirmish with them, handled them verie roughly: although sir William Breerton, sir John Sparkeham, master William Dreghzie, Cathert Claugham, and other the captains of the Englishmen did behaue themselves right manfully, bringing their men in order, encouraging them, and doing what appertained vnto hardie and skillfull warriors. But yet three times that day the Scots and Frenchmen put them from the high of the hill, till at length sir James Croft coming from Berwick, vied such diligence and politie in the matter, that the Scots and Frenchmen were repelled and constrained to retire, withdrawing backe into Almouth, after they had continued in skirmish from one of the clocke till it was past foure with no small losse on both parts.

After this, the earle of Bothwell, being on the borders as lieutenant, according to the order for the time of his quarterage, entred on a day into Wighland, and sent his forraie to burne Fenton talone, keeping himselfe in ambush at Halthwell Swyre. Sir Henrie Persie aduertised that the Scots were thus entred, got together a thousand horse, and making forth to defend the countrie, set vpon the earle at the aforesaid place of Halthwell Swyre; but some feare entring into the hearts of the Englishmen, by reason of certaine shot which the Scots had there with them, fled, and were pursued by the Scots ouer the water of Till. There were taken adoue six score Englishmen, amongst whom capitaine Crington, and capitaine Bar, that had the leading of light horsemen, were two: beside diuerse other men of good account in service, as one Claugham a gentleman and such like.

About this time, whilest the lord Cure commonlie called Cues, remained capitaine of Berwick, one Birchaudie cousin to sir William Birchaudie lord of Grange, chanced to be taken prisoner into Berwick; and afterwards being ransomed, at his coming home to Almouth, he made report that he had bene to freelie vied, during the time that he remained prisoner, at the hands of the said lord Cure. By reason therof, vpon challenge made by Grange to fight a combat with the lord Cure, the matter grew to this issue; that where their degrees were not equall, Kase Cure brother to the lord Cure vnder-toke (in his brothers behalfe) to breake a staffe with the lord of Grange vpon the side of Haldon hill at a day appointed: where they met, either of them bringing twelue gentlemen with them, to see the stiall of this challenge performed.

But when they came to hand their arming, weapons blessed, the truth is so, that Grange was armed in a cote of plate, and a curace aloft upon it: wherewith some fault was found; because maister Cure was also armed in a single cote of plate, without any other peeces of armes for defense of his bodie. But yet he was the great courage of the said maister Cure, that he would not refuse the challenge, notwithstanding his adversaries advantage of armor. Whereupon they ran together, and brake both their shields; and as it fortuned maister Cure was hurt in the flanke. The warre being thus pursued betwixt England and Scotland; beside the incommenurable roads which are before mentioned, there were two great roads made into Scotland; the one by the earle of Westmerland; and the other by the earle of Northumberland: the lord Talbot being there, & having the leading of certain gentlemen. Porcuquet it was thought good by the Englishmen, not onely to annoy the Scots by land, but also by sea: whereupon Sir John Clere with certaine ships of warre sailed forth along the coast; till at length he arrived at the Isles of Orkneye, where going on land about an entrenchment, staying longer than was requisite, he was incourted by his adversaries, and flaine with many of his people; which were there on land with him. But though the Scots had good successe in that part; they sustained great damage on the west side of the realme, by a tourne which the earle of Suffex then made deputie of Ireland attempted against them. For the better understanding whereof ye shall note; that after the lord Clinton high admerall of England had burnt the towne of Conquest in Britaine, there were seven ships of warre appointed to passe into Ireland, as the Marie Willoughbie, the Peter barke, the Sacket, the Greafalon, and three other that were merchants, and appointed that yeare to serve the queene of England in hir warres.

There were also beside those seven ships of war, two bittellers appointed to attend upon them. Sir Thomas Cotton was ordained their admerall; and one Southwike of Dover was assigned to be their viceadmerall. Upon their arrivall in Ireland, the earle of Suffex having also prepared three other ships, with sufficient and necessarie provision for his tourne, embarked with so manie soldiers as convenientlie might be bestowed aboard in that fleet; containing twelue saile in the whole; and departing toward the west of Scotland, landed in a part of the countie called Kentire, with as manie soldiers and mariners as might be spared out of the ships, leaving them furnished with competent numbers for their safeguard; and being got to land, he passed forth into the countie, & burnt two houses that belonged to James Macconell chiefe governor of those parts, & a great enimie to the Englishmen.

He burnt also diuerse townes, villages, and hamlets belonging unto the said Macconell, with great store of coyne and other things which came in their waie. The Scots oftentimes skirmished with the Englishmen, but durst not adventure to joine with them in battell, they kept so good order by the earle of Suffex his politike and valiant conduction. There were a sort of Scots gotten into a boate meaning to have fled, but being apprehended by the Englishmen, they were executed. Finally, after the earle had remained there on land, in burning and spoiling the countie for the space of three daies, he returned to his ships, and in safetie went aboard againe with his men: and making saile to the Ile of Arrane, entred the haven called Amalasche, and landing at that place, burnt the countie; and after went to Couper; where the like was burnt and harried that Ile of Arrane, and other parts thereof.

This done, he meant to have gone into other places, like Arundell; but the winds grew so terrible with tempests and foule weather, that they lost one of their ships; and some of the rest were so rent & spoiled of their tackle and furniture, as they were forced to be in great hazard of being cast away also. There were six and twenty mariners drowned, the which perceiving the ship to be in danger of sinking, fled into the boate, and so perished: the other that remained in the ship were saved, as maister Francis Randall, and others; by reason whereof, perceiving foule weather, the earle of Suffex was constrained to returne into Ireland, arriving in Cragfergus, where he landed with his soldiers; and appointing the ships to returne into England, he passed by land into Dublin, spoiling the countie, committed by the waste; and taking from them a great prebend bottle of cattell, notwithstanding the painfull passage that he had to make, through the numberlesse bogs, boggs, and fens, without reliefe of all necessarie things, in that so troublesome a tourne.

Thus far for those yeares warre in the daies of Marie quene of England, betwixt the Englishmen and Scots: whereof sith I have found none that hath written any thing at all, I have yet set downe those notes, as I have learned the same of such as had good cause to know the truth thereof, being eye-witnesses themselves of such enterprises and exploits as chanced in the same warres; namely capteine Wead, capteine Wood, capteine Crington, capteine Warleie, and capteine Parkham; with others, which of their courtesie have willingly imparted to me the report of diuerse such things; as I wisht to be resolved in. Which accordingly (so far as my remembrance hath served) I have here delivered, to the end the same might give occasion to others (that may happily light upon more full instructions) to impart to posteritie a more perfect discourse, where otherwise the matter might peradventure wholly passe in forgetfulness.

And now to returne unto the Scottish ambassadors, that were sent into France, for the conclusion of the marriage betwixt their queene & the Dolphin. After that the same marriage was consummat, and euery thing ordered and brought to passe according to the effect of their commission; in the moneth of August they took their leaue of the French king, the queene, and nobilitie there, to returne homeward into Scotland: albeit few of them came home, for the bishop of Orkneye departed this transitory life in Diepe, the fiftenth of September; the earle of Norths deceased there the ninth of November; the earle of Caillis lord treasurer departed in the same place the fourteenth of November; and the lord Fleming deceased in Paris the eightenth of December. And so onelie the archbishop of Glasgow, the prior of saint Andrews, and the lard of Dun returned into Scotland in October. After whose coming, there was a parlement summoned by the queene, to be holden in December next.

In August, Archibald Campbell erle of Argyle, whose wit was singular in dispatch of the affaires of peace as of warre, was made high iustice of Scotland; and in France was advanced to the title of a knight of the order of saint Michaele. Few daies betwene these things departed this life the bishop of Brechin, and Andrew Durie bishop of Whitechurch. To the one did succeed the abbat of Couper, in place of the other came Alexander Gordon archbishop of Athens by the queenes benefit. David Painter or Painter bishop of Ross, & James Stewart, whome James the sixt (being illegitimate father unto him) had made abbat of Melrose and Kello died also this yeare. Whole monasteries the quene did forthwith giue unto the cardinall Gulse, long after which followed also the death of the ab-bat of Barmoth. At this same time many prodigious sights (which I will not here recite, being toucht by Leshus) did appeare by a marker of such ominous things; whereof these verses were made: Porrenthum est iugiter a gemitu, quod amine lafo Diuina stridula in pectore

In September there was a parliament holden at Edinburgh, in which the acts of the former legats in France (about the mariage of the quene of Scots to the Dolphin) were confirmed. At what time the Dolphin of France by his ambassadors did demonstratie request, that the crowne (which they terme matrimoniall) should be giuen unto him by the decree of the states, whereby he might be called king of Scotland as long as the quene lived. The quene also (touching it a point of honor, to heape all title of glorie which she could vpon her husband, as one that by a detestable inclination of mind did vertuouslie saue him; gaue in charge also to the ambaladors, that they should earnestlie follow the same cause amongst the Scots. And to the end to draw them the more easilie into his opinion; he drew the matter into certaine articles, deliuered to the ambassadors with more ample instructions touching the same: the summe of all which was this.

First, diligentlie to beat into the Scots with what disposition of mind the Dolphin was affected toward them, as well as his father, who held the Scots in that account as he did his owne people; and so alwaies would haue them: which good mind of the French toward the Scots to be plaine without any dissimulation, it maie well appeare as well by the covenants established for the marriage, as also by the benefits which he hath not onelie bestowed vpon the Scots and Scotland in generalitie, but also in par-ticularitie vpon certaine especiall Scots, of his owne free will, almost without the request of any bodie. And that they should also further laie abroad, what helpe the quene and Scots haue had of the worthy cardinall of Lorraine, & the duke of Guise the quenes vncke. All which the ambassadors their-selues (as they haue fullie proued) did well vnder-stand.

Secondlie, where the quene doth thinke that she is greatlie benefitted with manie honors by so great a king, but especiallie in this, that so mightie a prince hath taken her into the fellowship of the holie bed, by which there can not any other commoditie grow to the king than the revenues of the kingdome which he hath purchased with his great charge and labor: and that the quene considering all this (with great grieve of mind) doth seeke by what meanes she might at least expresse some small token of a thank-full mind for so manie benefits (because if she should not do something, no small blot would seeme to be imputed to the quene and the Scots) it came into her mind to thinke by what meanes she could requite some part thereof, which she could do (as she thought) if at the least she did but honor her husband with the kinglie title, & giue unto him the marriage crowne of Scotland.

This thing therefore the quene her selfe doth ear-nestlie desire, and doth courteouslie request all the states of Scotland, that the same maie be established by the voices of the full parliament; and that they will command some three or foure of the chiefest nobilitie honorable to carie the ensignes of the kingdome to him, that at the least by this token of loue, the king & the best of the court maie well perceiue, with what reuerence and with what dutie they saueur the king her husband.

And to the end that this request of the quene, for the rarenesse of the example, should not breed any doubt in the mind of the nobilitie; and to hold them as if were in suspence, it was giuen in charge also to the ambassadors, that they should in manner point with their finger, that manie ages past, the quene of Spaine did not onelie for loue the doctore vnto him, adorne the duke of Ardon her husband, with the bare name of a king; but did also by the consent of the nobilitie, giue him title and gouernement ouer the same kingdome. The like whereof was also done in our memoire to the quene of Spaine to her husband the archduke of Austria, & by the quene of Portugal to the duke of Brabant.

But if that the Scots be moued by the example of the English, who haue excluded Philip king of Spaine, that then the ambassadors should easilie wipe away that doubt, if they admonish the Scots that the English are not tied to the Spaniards with that kinde and needfull band as the Scots are to the French; both which nations haue one priuilege, magistrats to gouerne, and one fellowship and participation of the administration of all the things in either kingdome. What vnto they must further adde that it was so far off, that the English should reape any fruit or commoditie by the Spaniards, that the king of Spaine himselfe did (as it were) loosing from the English all the dominion he could, to performe his affaires out of the realme. And further, that the English bring out of all hope for their quene to haue any issue by the same marriage, they would not grant vnto it, when there is a certaine and full hope left to the Scots, that issue may come of this marriage.

Besides all this, let it be opened vnto the Scots, what great benefit maie rebound vnto them by this signe of a thankfull mind. For it maie so happen, that if the king Dolphin shall seeke himselfe increased with this title of honor by the Scots, as a note of their good fauour to him, that he maie raise by his father the king of France; that he will not by any meanes permit the quene of Scots his wife to be excluded from the kingdome of England, after the death of quene Marie, who was not like to liue long being soe troubled with the droppe.

These things and manie others were giuen in charge to the ambassadors (comen out of France) to declare to the parlement of Scotland. Which being thus declared to the states and the quene regent, with might and maine seeking the furthering thereof; at length it was granted that he should be king during the life of the quene. For which cause Wil-lesper Campbell earle of Argile, and James Steward, bassard brother to the young quene, being persons of S. Andrews, were named to execute their consent vnto the Dolphin, to declare him king; and to inuest him with the ornaments thereto belonging, and further to shew the readie minds of the Scots toward him, not onlie in this but in all other things: by which any honor or profit might any waie rise vnto him.

But whilst these men doe prepare all things for such a iournie, certaine factious persons did beat into their eares, how heauie a iournie that would be vnto them. For it would happen, that whilst they were busie in prouiding for small things abroad, they should by delate corrupt, or by absence cleane ouerfurne matters of greater importance at home. For they did know how the subtil wit of James, and the great power and strength of the earle of Argile would be misling in those new things which were in hand amongst these of the religion: for which they neuer left off intreating and perswading, vntill they had wholie staied them from that iournie.

During these affaires, Marie quene of England died, and that worthy ladie Elizabeth succeeded in hir place. Immediatlie thereupon, the yong quene of Scots bare hir selfe as heire to that kingdome, and caused all hir hangings, bedding, vessels, and other household stuffe to be stamped and marked with the title and armes of the kings of England. And although France were then miserable afflicted in chalenging the dominion and gouernment of Aquilane, Naples, and Flanders; yet they would needs heape euill vpon euill, and adde therevnto the title of England, as being vnto them a herie home, and mockerie (as Buchanan tearmeth it.) Neither did the wisser sort of the French looke into that matter: for the Guises, who at that time gouerned all things, did content to this error of the Scottish quene, because they would thereby seeme to haue gotten to themselves a singular hono^r in adding the title of England to the French name.

The regent hauing now gotten a consent (as before you haue heard) of the matrimoniall crowne to be bestowed vpon the husband of the yong quene of Scots, began after a sort to put on a new mind: for by little and little she conuerted that old and accepted courtelie, into commanding arrogancie; and the gentle answers wherewith she was wont to appease all parts, were turned contrarie. Which before she durst not do by reason of the present state, which then was such, as she feared not to promise what she would not haue to be performed, because she had not then obtayned the grant of the matrimoniall crowne: but now hauing all things after hir owne mind, she vsed other conditions, and other speeches. There was also a parlement appointed at Striueling in the first Ihes of Maie.

And because she was heard oftentimes to saie, that she would not suffer the maiestie of the chiefe gouernement to be cast downe from the seat thereof, but would restore it to the former place. By which sayings manie were admonished of some troublesome tempest to follow. Whereupon diuerse came to treat hir for the protestants, amongst which for the dignitie of his name, to make the matter to be more easilie obtained, there were sent Alexander Cunnigame earle of Glencarne, and Hugh Campbell shiriffe of Aine, a worthy knight, before whom the regent could not restraîne hirselfe, but burst forth into these wordes.

These men (saith she) sith they haue preached not verie sincerelie, shall be banished, though you and your ministers resist against it. And when they replied, beseeching hir that she would remember what she had often promised: she answered, that the performance of promise is to be chalenged of princes, so farre as it seemeth commodious for them to performe it. Wherevnto they replied, that they therefore renounced all dutie and obedience vnto hir, and did further forswearne hir of the great mischiefs that would flow out of this fountaine: with which answer she being stroken more than she looked for, said in the end, that she would both thinke on it and them.)

In Iulie and August, there was a conuention of all the prelates and cleargie holden at Edinburgh, in the which certeine men & women of Edinburgh were accused of heresie, and abjured at the towne crosse with faggots on their backs: [whereupon (as saith Lesleus lib. 10. pa. 538.) were great tumults raised at Edinburgh, for the appealing whereof, the lord Selton was made gouernor there.] In this assemble it was required, that the common prayers might be read in the Scottish tongue in churches, with certeine other articles of reformation, whereof the answer was deferred till March, in which moneth a prouinciall councell was appointed to be holden at Edinburgh. The second of March, the said prouinciall councell of all the prelates and clergie of Scotland began, wherein diuerse articles were proposed by the temporallie: as to haue the prayers and administration of the sacraments in the Scottish language, the election of bishops and all beneficed men to passe by the voices of the temporall lords & people of their diocesses and parishes, with diuerse other reformatiōs: all the which the bishops refused to grant, where through there arose shortly after great trouble in Scotland.

The quene regent caused summons to be given to John Knox, John Molloche, John Dowglas, and Paule Hestane, to appeare at Striueling the tenth day of Maie: and for lacke of appearance they were denounced rebels, and put to the horne. Whereupon the said John Knox being in Perth, perswaded the master of Hildesie, the lords of Culibardin, Dun, Hettarrow, and diuerse other being there assembled, with the burgeses of the towne of saint Johns towne and Dundee, to pull downe the images and altars in all churches, and to suppress the houses of friers, & other religious places. Who after a sermon made by him to that effect, the same tenth of Maie they began in saint Johns towne, and cast downe the abbeie of the Charterhouse, the Blache and Carmelite friers, called the Tullulum [and so cleane, that (as saith Buchanan) within two daies there was left no signe thereof almost to be seene] and reformed all other churches thereabouts, breaking downe the images and altars in Fife, Angus, Pernis, and other parts there next adioining.

The quene regent being aduertised thereof, sent for the duke of Chatelaerault, and diuerse other of the nobilitie, as the earles of Atholl, Argile, Marshall, and others, who came with hir to Perth, otherwise called saint Johns towne, hauing with them two thousand Frenchmen [to whom also repaired (as saith Lesleus lib. 10. pag. 548) the archbishop of saint Andrew and Glasgow, the bishops of Dunkeld, and Dunblane, James prior of saint Andrews, the abbat of Coloper and Dunfermeling, with manie other chiefe of the cleargie] who entered the towne by appointment of the lord Ruthen capteine thereof, and so receiuing it, gaue it in keeping to capteins James Stewart, and capteine Cullane, with their bands of men of warre. In the meane time the erle of Argile, and the prior of saint Andrews, left the quene in Perth, and went to saint Andrews, joining themselves with the other, and made reformation of the churches, casting downe altars, images, houses of friers, and abbeyes in that towne, and in Coloper, and other places thereabout: and assembling a great companie of countrie men, came to Londros, Balmeare, & Coloper, to make resistance against the Frenchmen that were in Falkeland with the quene [coming thither from Perth, after that she had left in Perth five hundred men under the charge of James Stewart cardinall, & James Cullane.] But when they should haue met on Coloper more in battell, the duke of Chatelaerault, the earle Marshall, and others laboured betwixt them, so that the battell was staied, & the quene with the Frenchmen returned vnto Edinburgh.

The earle of Argile, the prior of saint Andrews, and their assurers, came to saint Johns towne and besieged it, till it was to them surrendered. The erle of Huntlie was sent to them from the quene to treat with them of some accord, but he profited not. At the same time a certeine number of persons of the towne of Dundee & Perth, came to the abbeie of Scone, and spoiling the church, burnt it with the most

most part of the house, the earle of Argyle, and the prior of saint Andrewes being with them in companie. After this they went to Striueling, and to Liffquod, where they caused the houses of the blacke friers and grate friers to be throwne downe. From thence they passed to Edenburgh, where the quene hearing of their comming, departed with the Frenchmen vnto Dunbar, the duke of Chatelerault, and the erle of Huntlie being with hir in companie.

The earle of Argyle and his companie, called the lords of the congregation, were receiued into Edenburgh by the bailiffes of the towne, where the places of the blacke and grate friers were suddenly ouerthrowne, & the Church a field, and Trinitie college, and saint Giles church were reformed, and the images and altars pulled downe. The lords remaining thus in Edenburgh [apprehended Robert Richardson (as saith Lesleus) that was gouernor of the publicke treasure, toke the keis by force from him, entered the abbey] the coining house, toke the coining tools, seized vpon the quenes moueables, which they found in the palace, and kept the same. * Whilist these things were thus done at Edenburgh, Marwell lord Harries gouernor of the west marches, which at that time was detained prisoner in Edenburgh castell, did priuily get out of the same by a rope hanged to the wall, and hauing speedie horses, departed to his owne companie, shortly after joining himselfe to the lords of the religion.]

Monsieur Doissell and the Frenchmen came from Dunbar to the links of Leith, accompanied with the duke of Chatelerault, the earles of Huntlie, Bothwell, Spourton, and others. And the lords of the congregation came forth of the towne of Edenburgh of purpose to haue giuen battell to the Frenchmen, albeit they were not sufficient partie to resist them. But the erle of Huntlie travelled betwixt them, by whose meanes there met tielue on euerie side, who agreed vpon certeine articles, and so the quene and Frenchmen entered into Leith, and shortly began to fortifie it.

The articles of agreement betweene the regent and the lords of the reformed religion.

I First, that all the souldiers of the religion, and such as did belong to them, should depart from Edenburgh, and leaue the same to the gouernement of the quene: with this prouiso, that the citizens should either remaine, or depart at their pleasure.

2 Item, that those of the religion should restore vnto the magistrats wholie and trulie all such sums of monie, or other pretious things, which they had either priuily taken, or by open force spoiled from the magistrats.

3 Thirdlie, that the quenes palace, which they of the religion did possesse, with all the furniture and ornaments thereof, should be deliuered by againe to such as should be appointed therefore.

4 Fourthlie, that they of the religion should not depart, before they had committed the lord Rutherford and Wetherrow (whome they promised to put in pledges for their credit and good dealing) to the keeping of such as were on the quenes part.

5 Fifthlie, that all men should acknowledge the gouernement of the king and the quene to be lawfull, which before they had gaine said by the pretense of religion: and that they should faithfully obeie the regent, and the old lawes of the kingdome, except such decrees as pertained not to religion.

6 Sixthlie, that they should not by any meanes trouble the catholike priests and ecclesiasticall persons, or hinder them from quiet gathering and inioyning their rents, tithes, and profits, vntill the fourth Ides of Januarie.

7 Seuenthlie, that they should not from henceforth violate or deface churches, religious houses, or any other holie places.

8 Eighthlie, that euerie man might at Edenburgh professe and vse what religion he would, which they commonlie called the libertie of conscience.

9 Ninthlie, that the quene regent should faithfully prouide, that the preachers of the reformed religion should not be molested or hurt, either by hir, or by any of the catholike gouernors. Both parties being thus satisfied with these conditions, the French entered Leith.]

Shortly after this, the duke of Chatelerault, partly through persuation of the earle of Argyle his sisters sonne, and the Westland lords, and partly because he understood that his son the earle of Arrane was fled forth of France to Geneva for the religion, he toke part with the lords from that time forth against the aduise of the bishop of saint Andrewes, and diuerse other his friends. This yere in June, Henrie the king of France, at the triumph of the marriages betwixt the king of Spaine and his daughter, and duke of Sanoie and his sister, was wounded in iusts at the tourneillis in Paris by the count Montgomerie, and died of the hurts the tenth of Iulie next ensuing, being the eleuenth day after he was wounded. Then Francis his sonne, that had married the quene of Scotland, was crowned king at saint Denis, and annointed at Reims in September following.

* In the moneth of September, Croke a noble man of France was sent to the regent, to comfort hir in the kings name, declaring vnto hir that an armie was preparing to come into Scotland, vnder the leading of the marquesse of Albufe or Elbuse (as saith Buchanan) and that in the meane time with all speed some troopes of men should shortly be there with monie, and other defenses of warre. And to the end that nothing should want to further hir, the king would shortly send certeine noble men into Scotland, which should counsell hir in these troublesome affaires. Besides which, he brought letters out of France from the king and the quene, to the prior of saint Andrewes, in which they rather sought to incline his mind by courtesie to obedience, before that they would inforce him thereto by warre. Which letters being by Lesleus turned out of French into Latine, are by me thus deliuered in English, with the answer of the prior to the same.

Francis king of France to Iames prior of the monasterie of saint Andrewes.

After that I understood by certeine letters, & by the common report of all (my cosine) that Scotland did flame in euerie part with tumults and seditions, it is strange to see how greatlie I was astonished therat. But when I heard that you (to whome my dear father, my deere wife, and my selfe, haue giuen so manie large benefites) should be forgetfull of them all liberallie bestowed, and become the author, head, and nourisher of this fire of contention and bralles; I could not be perswaded that you would so farre digresse from that office and dutie of pietie, which you haue alwaies made shew to beare vnto the quene. But if the thing were so, as the common fame doth report of you, I did verelie thinke that the promises and flattering words of others had inticed you to this deceit, onelie to take the fault vpon you; for whose cause (when they had discharged themselves thereof) the offense would seeme to be either none, or verie small, after that you had taken it vpon you. Which my opinion of you, if it be true, it shall be as ioisfull to me, as that which should be most ioisfull: for by this meanes I wish that some part of my displeasure (into which I would haue you thinke that you are woorthilie fallen) were quenched, in that you haue (as I heare) but onelie deceiued the good hope which we conceiued of your pietie towards God, and your faithfull seruice towards me.

Wherefore, sith nothing is more dære or acceptable vnto me, than that (controuersies appeased) all things without anie tumult maie be knit together by the law of good order: and sith the same (as it seemeth to me) maie best be done by your trauell, I doe admonish you by these letters, and (for the good will I beare you) doe earnestlie request you, that you will returne to your owne profit and fidelitie, from which you haue most shamefullie fallen, to the end that I maie by the same more plainlie vnderstand that you carie an other mind than that which I can gather out of your foolish doings, the which shall then faillie appere to me, if at length you so bend all your force, that all things disordered in those parts, maie by your diligence be called backe to the commonwealths ancient, sound, and holie forme of obedience, which you know is due to God and me.

Otherwise I would haue you be persuaded that I will shortly subdue you, and all those which shall cleane or minister helpe vnto you, in taking iust punishment vpon you, which I will bitterlie execute. The charge of declaration thereof, and the further large expressing of my mind, I haue committed to this bearer, whome I would haue you credit as much as my selfe. I praye God (cosine) to keepe you in health. Paris the sixteenth kalends of August.

With which letters also the quene of Scots directed other letters in this forme, as here followeth.

Marie queene of Scots, and Dowager of France, to James the prior of the monasterie of Saint Andrewes.

I Can not (cosine) but greatlie wonder, that you which are not onelie nearest to vs by blood, but are also (as you know) greatlie benefited by vs with manie liberalities, should be either of that malice or boldnes, that you would with one fault ouerthrow the maiestie of God, and violate the authoritie of me and the king my husband. For it is a thing woorthie of great admiration, to consider how it might happen that you who being present, did open to me the names of the duke of Chatelaerault, and of manie others, which lined to you to diminish my authoritie, should now being absent (as a leader and head of all other seditious persons) hurt my dignitie, and that in matters of greatest weight, in which the honor of God is lessened, and my authoritie clearelie taken awaie: all which I should more easilie haue beleued of anie other my subiects, than of you.

Trulie most grieuouslie (as I ought) I beare this, that you haue falsified that faith to me, which had a speciall hope of your fidelitie: though as yet I can scarce be persuaded to thinke you to be so farre from truth and reason, that you would be caried awaie in to such blind errors. All which I desire to fall out to be as true, as true maie be, requesting also of God so to giue to you his light, that returning into the right waie, you maie shew your selfe a good man, and obedient to our lawes, by doing contrarie things to that which you haue already performed. Wherefore, by these letters I admonish, and with intreatie as earnestlie as I can, desire you to recompense your former euill with following good deeds, and that the anger (which I and the king my husband haue bitterlie conceiued against you) maie by that meanes be pacified. Otherwise trulie I would haue you vnderstand, we will execute such punishment vpon you, that you shall for euer be mindfull thereof. The which doubtlesse if you compell vs by your deedes to performe, it shall be to you a most grieuous thing. I praye God keepe you from all danger. Paris the 9 kalends of August.

James Stewart the prior of saint Andrewes (whome prosperous successles had before advanced) did in reading these letters of the king and quene so frie in anger and hatred, that he could not forbear but must needs retorne answer, expressing the same (after confirmed by his deedes) though now somewhat smothered with good words. The effect of which letters were in this sort: That he was grieued in his mind as much as he might, because he was so farre fallen into the milke and displeasure of those princes, whome he reuerenced with great dutie, that they should bitterlie obiect vnto him in their letters that he was a seditious person, noted of ingratitude, fraught with malice, and deiled with heresie.

Touching which notes of these wickednes, sith they were imputed to him by the nobilitie of Scotland (meaning such as stood against the reformed religion) he with faire speeches requested the princes, that they would not attribute more to the malice of his enemies in accusing him, than to his brightness in purging himselfe: and that they should not thinke anie thing to be spoken by his enemies, but that which sauoured of malice, enuie, and hatred, especiallie sith they did not onelie go about to diminish his fame abroad amongst the princes, but also at home did openlie laie wait for his life and liuing.

But he would so labor, that all men should well perceiue his good mind (towards the princes) fullie laied abroad without anie veile of dissimulation, whereby his aduersaries should be ashamed to haue laied such open reproch against him, and the king & quene should mislike that they had so easilie credited his enemies. Wherefore he desired that hereafter they should rather beleue anie thing of him, than that he would be noted for an vnthankfull man, as they had obiected vnto him. From the detestable spot whereof (being of all the verie worst, sith nature abhorreth the same) he would keepe himselfe, and rather die by anie kind of torment, than to suffer the least spot of such a vice to dwell in his name, especiallie in the affaires of that king and quene, whereof he had found the first most courteous, and the second most bountifull.

And therefore, as he had with all dutie hitherto prosecuted their fauour, so he (would during his life) contend, that his trauell, diligence, and faith, should neuer want in performing or defending their affaires, so that they would not burthen him with that which might be a detriment to the cause of God and religion: for if either of them were in hand, neither the fraudulent counsels of his struing aduersaries, neither the bitter words of the sharpe threats of the king or quene, should make him leaue off, or repress the

cc Therefore he would not haue the king or quene to thinke that their authoritie is touched, when he labored to pull auaite the deuises of the papists. From which queltie thing (as he supposed) the honor of God, the glorie of the king and quene, and the helpe and health of his countrie to be contained therein he will not be withdraue by the force of anie man; nor be in quiet for all the threats of the king and quene, until he haue wholie cut auaite the branches of superstition, and utterly pulled vp the roots thereof.

cc Crokes handcarle performed his ambassage for which he came (as before you haue heard) in deliuering these letters: but forthwith alanded at Leith a Traurian a Frenchman, with foure troops of soldiers, with a great masse of monie, & other furniture needfull for the warres: whome after a few daies the regent sent back againe into France, to requyre of the king, that foure other companies of soldiers might be sent ouer, which might with those already holding Scotland, supplie the number of twentie companies; to whome also it were expedient to ioine a hundred horsemen, which number she affirmed would suffice to pacifie all the tumults in Scotland, so that foure ships well appointed might alwaies lie in the haven of Leith, to watch the port: All which if the Scots were prouider by the benefit of the king, and that the comming of his brother the marquisse of Albute were hastened, she promised them to bring all things to an end.

Besides which, she did also signifie vnto the king, that the Scots of the reformed religion, for the increase of their faction, had secretlie growen in league with some of the nobilitie of France, who did ballie send letters and messengers to the Scots, to incourage them not to leaue off from their attempts; promising also vnto them that they would hinder (by all the meanes they could) that no great armie should be made out of France against them: and moreover, in that the Scots had sent ambassadors to Germanie, and into Denmarke, for religious cause, to requyre aid from thence, but their chieffest and principall hope did rest (as saith Lelous) in England.

During these things, the duke of Chateleraut and the lords of the congregation sent to the quene (whereof we will speake more hereafter) beseeching hir to leaue off from making of forts within the realme. But she would not grant so to do: wherefore they assembled their whole forces in Edenburgh, and besieged the towne of Leith in October: the quene and Frenchmen, with the bishops of saint Andrews, Glasgow, Dunfreis, the lord of Seton, and diuerse other Scottishmen being within it. But the Frenchmen of warre issued forth of Leith, and met nere to the abbey of Holie rood house, with the Scottish lords and their companie, where manie Scottishmen were slaine, & the rest chased into Edenburgh: the Frenchmen also following them vnto the gates of Edenburgh, had entred, if those within the castell had not shot off the artilerie at them, to stave the slaughter and pursue.

In the time of this siege, the young lard of Leithington, secretarie to the quene, being with hir in Leith, left the towne, & secretlie departing, got him to the lords, and holpe greatlie afterwards to obtaine aid out of England. After this, the quene and Frenchmen came to Edenburgh, which was peaceablie rendred to them, where they remained all that winter. About the same time, Nicholas Pelue the bishop of Amiens, monsieur de la Brosse, & two doctors of diuinitie, came to Scotland in September, and la Brosse was made lieutenant of the French armie, monsieur Partigues coronell of the footmen.

And with them came a great companie of French souldiers vnto the quene regent, so that then the French power was thirtie fixe hundred good men of warre, besides two bands of Scottish souldiers, vnder the leading of capteine Anthonie Kenedie, and James Stewart of Cardonall.

* The Frenchmen being thus entered France, the chiefest of the nobilitie were assembled at Edenburgh, of whome there was a day required of hearing to be giuen to la Brosse, and to the bishop, affirming that they were sent thither as ambassadors. To whome it was answered, that they did not seeke peace (as they did dissemble) but threaten war: for other wise to what end were it to bring armed soldiers to dispute thereof? For the Scots were not ignorant of the state of things, that they would commit them selues to that deciding of matters, in which they might be compelled to accept conditions answerable to the mind of the aduersarie. But if amongst weapons it pleased them to make peace, they would also prouide, that they would not rather seeme to be vnto them thereunto by compulsion, than quietly led by reason. For if they did trulie from their heart require that in deed which they seeme in words, they would discharge those strange souldiers, and meet (as they haue often done in other places) vnarmed, as to a thing that by words and reason is to be decided, and not by swords the strength to be compassed. And thus much for the ambassadors.

Now you haue heard before of the battell of Leith, the besieging and the regaining of Edenburgh; touching which, because it is omitted before in the reciting of the things done in those places, I thinke it not amisse (though it come a little out of course) to set it downe (as Buchanan hath placed the same) next after the speeches used to those ambassadors. Thus therefore he writeth touching the defense of Leith. These noble men (meaning those at Edenburgh) did write to the quene much after this maner, That they did greatlie maruell, that the regent prouoked with no iniuries, did so sone depart from the former covenants; and expelling the ancient inhabitants of Leith, and placing there a colonie of strangers, she would in that place build a castle to the destruction of the lawes and liberties of the realme, and to the danger of the liues of them all. Wherefore they did earnestlie intreat hir, that she would desist from this thing rashlie attempted (against the faith of hir promise, the publike commoditie, and the lawes and liberties of the kingdome) least she inforce them by necessitie to prae in aid of the whole people.

Besides which also, they which were assembled at Edenburgh, did write to the same effect; about a moneth after that they had dispatched the other letters, adding these petitions to the same last letters; That ouerthrowing the new fortresses, she would command all the strangers and hired people to depart out of the towne, to the end that it might be free for all men (according to iustice) there to traffike and vse their mutuall trade of buying & selling one with an other. The which if she refused to do, they would take it for a sure token, that she ment to bring this kingdome into seruitude; against which euill they would prouide all whatsoeuer remedie that they could. Within three daies after, the quene sent Robert Forman chiefe herald to answer the matter, with instructions and commandements deliuered to him in these words.

First of all, you shall shew vnto them, that nothing could happen vnto vs more contrarie to our opinion, than that there should be anie other hauing authoritie here, besides my daughter and hir husband my sonne in law, vpon whome all our authoritie doth depend; that the former acts of the nobilitie,

"tie, and this present request, or rather commande"ment doth well declare, that they acknowledge no "other superiortie; and that their demands (or rather "threatnings) with what shew of words soever they be "cloked, are sufficientlie enough knowen unto vs, as "no new things. Again, you shall require of the duke "of Chastelaucourt, that he call to mind what he hath "promised to vs by his words, and to the king by his "letters. Which was, that he would not onelie hear"ken to the kings commandement; but also worke, "that his sonne the earle of Arrane should not at all "ioine with those tumults of the countrie, and whether "the things which he now doth, are the performance "of his promises.

"To their letters also you shall answer; that we
 "haue openlie shewed our indueor to bring things to "quiet; that we will grant to anie thing, which maie
 "not resist the pietie due to God, and doth not fight "with their duetie towards their king and quene, and "that I did neuer so much as once thinke of the over"throw of their lawes and libertie; and much lesse, so "much as dreame of conquering the kingdome by "violence. For to whome, or for whome should I seeke "the kingdome, when my daughter doth already "possesse it? Touching the defense and fortifying of "Leith, you shall aske them this; whether that we at "anie time haue attempted anie thing that waie, be"fore that they with manie assemblies, and at length "with conspiracie among themselves, did openlie "shew that they would shake off the lawfull gouerne-"ment, and before that they at their pleasure troubled "the whole publike state (vnto knowledge to vs, who "held the place and authoritie of the chiefeest gouernor)
 "strengthened their factions with strong cities, and "made league and couenants with our ancient en"emies?

"And to omit other things, what cause can they (in "the end) bring forth, whie it was lawfull for them to "reueine an armie at Edinburgh, to inuade the gou"uernors of those affaires? And that it is not lawfull "for vs at Leith for our owne defense and safetie, to "haue anie other gard about vs? Cruellie they seeke
 "this therein, that we should laboꝝ to shun their furie
 "(as hitherto we haue done) by continuall and daile "change of places. Is there anie thing in their let"ters that mentioned their dutie to the right magi"strate? Doth there lie open anie waie for the resto"ring of concord? Do they shew anie token that "they would haue these seditions pacified, and that "they would all things should be reduced to their for"mer state?

"Let them cloke this with what colour they will of "publike commoditie; yet it is manifest that they "thinke and seeke nothing lesse. For if they had one-"lie staied vpon a concord, we haue often shewed "them a waie thereunto. Neither are they ignorant "that these French had (by the commandement of "their king) bene long before dispatched out of Scot"land, vnlesse their doings had bene the cause of "their state. Wherefore, if they will yet now offer
 "anie honest conditions which may induce vs to hope;
 "and that (the maiestie of the gouernement alwaies "saued sound) maie declare that they will modestlie "and obedientlie obeie their superiours; we will re"fuse no means to restore a concord & quiet amongst "them and vs, nor omit anie thing that maie tend to "the publike commoditie.

"Neither are we alone so affected towards them,
 "but also their king and quene; who hath sent vnto "them a worthy knight of the order of the scallop "shell, and one of the chiefe of the ecclesiasticall order, "with letters and commandements touching the "same: whome they did so contemne, as that they "would not bouchsafe them answer, no not so much as hearing. Wherefore, you shall demand, and command the duke, the nobilitie, and all others of that condition soeuer, that they depart in sunder; or otherwise, that they shall not be kept together, vnlesse it be by strength of armes. To all this the next day, which was the three and twentieth of October, the nobilitie answered after this order.

"We easilie vnderstand by your letters and com-mandements sent by the herald, how obstinatlie you be euillie minded against pietie towards God, the publike commoditie of the realme, and the common libertie of vs all: all which things we must defend, as of right we ought. Wherefore, from henceforth we do suspend and forbid your gouerne-ment, in the name of the king and quene, or by what other name or title you do vsurpe the publike administration of the kingdome; as persons certeinlie knowing, that those things which are now done by you, do with the mind of those princes fight against the publike safetie of this realme.

"And as you do not esteeme vs lawfull subiects of those princes & of this kingdome, to make a publike senate or councill: so we do not acknowledge you for a regent to execute supreme authoritie; speciallie with the gouernement (if you haue anie such committed vnto you by the princes) is for most iust & weighty causes forbidden you: and that in the name of the same princes, whose counsellors we are bound to be, chiefe in matters which pertain to the safetie of all the people. And although we haue determined not to see anie danger, in deliuering of that towne, in which you haue placed strange and hired souldiers against vs: yet for the reuerence which we beare vnto you, as vnto our quene mother; we earnestlie with all faithfull intreatie beseech you, that you depart from thence; whilst the cause of publike commoditie doth inforce vs to recouer that towne by weapons.

"Besides which, we further request, that you will leade them out of the towne with you, within foure and twentieth houres; if there be anie which challenge vnto themselves the names of ambassadors, either to decide controuersies, or to gouerne the affaires. For it is but equitie that we prouide for the safetie, and willinglie spare the blood of all those hired souldiers, aswell for the ancient amitie which hath bene betwene the French and the Scots, as for the mariage of our quene with their king: which friendship we would rather should be increased than diminished. The same day also, the said herald declared at his returne to the regent, that the day before it was perswaded in an assembled coun-cell of the nobles and the other commons; that all the deeds and sayings of the regent did onelie tend to verie tyrannie.

"Herevpon, there was a decre made to take the gouernement from hir: so that the whole com-panie subscribed, as to a most iust matter: and that there they did forbid anie ambassage, giuen or sent to hir by hir sonne in law and hir daughter: further, commanding hir to execute no gouerne-ment, vntill the generall assemblee of a parlement to be appointed by them in such place as they should thinke conuenient. The five and twentieth daie, the lords of the religion sent an herald to Leith, to will all the Scots to depart the towne within foure and twentieth houres, and to separat themselves from the subuerter of publike libertie. Thus much Buchanan of this done about the state of Leith, before the nobilitie besieged the same (as is before set downe.)
 And so againe to the order of the historie.]

lan to Elizabeth the queene of England for assistance, to expell the Frenchmen. Whiche the queene of England granted, not onlie for to serue the Scottish mens turne; but speciallie for the sake of hir owne realme and state, which as the dukes thought to stand in danger of trouble; in case the Frenchmen were suffered to remaine in Scotland: considering the euill dealing of the French king and his counsell in some pointes already shewed. The queene of England therefore sent the duke of Northfolke to Berwicke, whither came to him the earle of Argile, the prior of saint Andrews, Harrie the maister of Maxwell, Robert Carnegie, and the young lord of Livingston secretarie; & made agreement to haue aid of England, to the effect aforesaid.

And for sure keeping hereof, the Scottish lords deliuered pledges into England, there to remaine during the life of the king of France, and one yeere after his decesse. The pledges were these: David Hamilton, sonne to the duke of Chateaufort; another called Colme Campbell, sonne to the earle of Argile; Robert Douglas, brother to the prior of saint Andrews; and the lord of Acheslun, and a sonne of the lord Ruthuen. About the same time, James Hamilton earle of Arrane, eldest sonne to the duke of Chateaufort, and capteine of the Scottish companies of men of armes and archers in France, being fled for religion secretlie to Geneva, from thence came by the conuoy of maister Randall Englishman into England: which at his coming into Scotland he performed, and joined himselfe with the earle of Argile, and other lords in the cause aforesaid.

The duke of Chateaufort, the earles of Argile, Arrane, and others, came to the towne of Glasgowe, and caused the images of altars to be taken downe, seizing the bishops living into their hands, and toke the castell of Glasgowe pertaining to the bishop, and put certeine gentlemen into it to keepe it. Whereof the Frenchmen being aduertised, marched forward to Glasgowe, to the number of fife thousand men: the bishop of Glasgowe, the lords Sempill, Seiton, Ros, and diuerse others with them, toke the castell againe, and staid one night of the towne, returned on the next morning to Kirkintulloch, and from thence to Lithgow and Edenburgh.

After their returne from Glasgowe, a certeine number of Frenchmen went to Striueling, and passing by the bridge over the water of Firth, came into Fife, in purpose to haue gone vnto saint Andrews, and to haue fortified the towne. But they being in Kingcorme, there assembled together in Fife the earles of Arrane, and Mothes, the prior of saint Andrews, the lord Ruthuen, the maister of Lindsey, and diuerse other, hauing with them no great number: but yet they daile skirmished with the Frenchmen, and would not suffer them to come from the sea side; where diuerse Frenchmen were slaine, and one of their capteins, with thirtie of his souldiers, and few Scottishmen, or in maner none: except that the earle of Southerland, who chanced to be with them at the picking, was sore hurt and maimed in the arme with the brydge of a calauer shot.

As the Frenchmen were in their progresse, at the mouth of the water of Leuin in Fife, there arrived in their sight a naue of ships: which at the first hearing they toke to be French ships, but shortly after perceiuing them to be the English naue, they returned with great diligence to Burnt Island, where they passed the ferrie of Kingcorme in botes and craters to Leith, and instantlie began to fortifie that towne, casting great trenches about it, and making great blockehouses for their defense, as preuenting such perils as otherwise might haue befallen them, and using remedies in due time, by warlike policie of present defense, to prouide against afterclaps. The English ships came to the rode of Leith, where they call anchor, the fourth Ides of August.

At the same time, whilst those of the religion had almost despoiled all monasteries, certeine battell of monks, hartlie for harted to the catholike religion (as the Romish cleergie tearmeth it) and hartlie blinded with desire of preie (as in all assemblies of battell there will be some) ouerthrew the monasterie of the Carmelite friers at Aberdeen. Who going about also to haue spoiled the monasteries of the Trinitie, and of the friers spinous, were hindered thereof by the lord Leslie, and the baron of Buchanane: at the commandement of the earle of Huntley. Notwithstanding which, they could not be so sufficientlie repressed, but that they went to old Aberdeen (for so they call that place in that towne, which is beautified with the bishops palace, the cathedral, and the vniuersitie) and would haue assaulted the magnificent and statelie church thereof. But to keepe them from the same, the bishop, & John Leslie (the official of that place, the one by counsell, the other by preaching; and both by the aid of the earle of Huntley) did their indeuor, at what time the Leslies put their bestes their purpose.

The queene regent hearing of the arrival of the English, sent vnto the viceadmirall of that fleet, named maister Winter, requiring to know of him, for what cause he was come into those waters. This gentleman addressing himselfe to accomplish the commandement imposed and laid vpon him, came face to face to the said vice-admirall, and with countenance, wherein appeared tokens of inward courage, put forth his demand as he was intoned. The viceadmirall answered, that he had bene abroad on the seas seeking after pirats, and in case anie of them came thither, he was arrived there in the forth to wait on them: where as the principall cause in deed was to impeach, that no Frenchman should land there, in case anie came forth of France, and also to keepe them that late in finkith from vessels, and that no Frenchman should passe by sea forth of Leith.

Whereupon the queene regent did send vnto the king of Frances orator in that realme, to request the queene of England, that she would call hir ships home againe, and that she would not send aiding souldiers to the lords of the religion (whome Leslies neuer tearmeth by anie other name than sedaries and seditious persons) whereby the peace might be broken with the French, and so occasion of warre giuen. Wherevnto hir maiestie answered (with no lesse care of hir kingdome than became the maiestie of so good a mother to haue of hir children) that she had no such mind as to make warre. But because that the certeinlie vnderstood, that great troops of Frenchmen did daile land and increase in Scotland, for what cause she knew not: she could do no lesse than place souldiers in diuerse forts and hauens, which might defend the English from the malice or hurt of such strangers, if they should attempt anie thing. Perther would she suffer that hir people should set foot in Scotland, vntesse that they were prouoked therevnto by iniuries offered them.

About the same time, the queene regent, hearing that the duke of Northfolke was come to Newcastle as generall lieutenant of the north, sent an herald with a letter to him, in which letter it was signified that the herald had credit to declare further matter than was contained in the same letter. But when he was demanded what he had to say, he denied to haue anie credit at all. Wherefore William Flower, then Chester herald, and now Portreie king of armes, was was sent unto the queene, who comming to Holie rood house nere to Edinburgh, was receiued by sundrie heralds, & so was had to one of their houses, and there kept for that night. The next day after he had dined, he was brought to the court, and at his entering within the gates, there were a number of harquebussiers readie with their peeces that discharged and shot off the same.

At his comming to the presence of the queene, he with dutifull obessance deliuered his letters, and after the same had bene read, he was demanded what credit he had to vttter. Whereupon he declared, that the duke of Posfolke, being the queenes maiesties lieutenant in the north parts of England, maruelled greatlie that she would send an herald with letters, and write therein how she had giuen credit to him; and yet when he was demanded to vtter his credit, he should confesse that he had none. The queene herewith called for the herald, to vnderstand whether he had credit or not: who denied to haue anie at all.
Wherewith the queene seemed to be somewhat abashed, but neuertheless she brake forth and said, that she maruelled greatlie that the queene of England should send hir ships into hir riuer, without giuing hir knowledge aforesaid.

Chester answered thereto, that where it was certeinlie knowne, that the French king had prepared to send a power of men of warre into Scotland, without aduertising hir thereof; she could not but thinke that dealing verie strange, and therefore had in verie deed sent certeine of hir ships, with vittels for prouision to be laid within hir townes and castles on the frontiers. Which ships by tempest being dispersed, might happilie be dizen into the riuer there, albeit he had not spoke with anie of them since there comming forth. But yet (as he had heard by others) they had bene verie vncourteouslie bled: for com-ming in after that maner for succor, the canon had bene bent against them. Herewithall the count Partigues standing by, began to speake verie stout words vnto Chester, alleging that where it was perceiued well enough, that the queene of England ment to make war against his maister the French king, he trusted she should gaine as little thereby, as his sister had done in breaking with hir father Henrie the late French king. Chester herevnto answered, that he thought to haue found but one regent in Scotland, to whome he should need to make answer: whereupon Partigues was commanded to silence.

All this while the queene had talked with Chester in the Scotish tong. And because he did not so well vnderstand hir, he began to speake in the French language: whereat the queene seemed greatlie to re-ioisse, & so began againe to discourse with him of hir griefs; and he on the other part made hir answer as fell best to purpose. And at length, when he was demanded what further credit he had; he declared, that where she had requested a safe conduct for monsieur le Brosse to passe through England into France, if she would see him safelie conueied to Bertwike, he durst assure hir of a sufficient safe conduct for his safe passage through the queene his mistresse realme: but at length, there was another gentleman commended to him, in lieu for la Brosse, that was his cousine. And now when Chester should take his leaue, he declared that he had not bene courteouslie dealt with: for since his comming thither, he could not be suffered to passe anie where abroad out of his chamber, but at meale times. And therefore if anie of hir messengers should come into the queene his mistresse dominions, he would procure (if he might) that they should tast of the like intertainment. But the queene seemed not to vnderstand that he had bin in ante: so he dealt with, the thing that she was not well contented therewith; and so Chester toke his leaue, and returned backe into England, without anie rewarde for his paines taken in that iourne, at the hands of the Scotish queene: how so euer she liked of his message.

In the meane time, there was an armie prepared in England, of seven or eight thousand men, who were sent into Scotland; the lord Greie of England being appointed generall, who came to the linkes, beside the towne of Leith, on saturday the first of April. Before they pitcht downe their field on the said linkes, monsieur Partigues, colonell of the French armie, issued forth of Leith with nine hundred harquebussiers of Frenchmen, to a little knoll called the Balke hill, where a fore, continuall, and hot skirmish was begun betwixt the Englishmen and Frenchmen, with hagbutts, calauiers, and pistolets, which skirmish continued five or six houres, in the which there were manie slaine on both parties, and diuerse hurt. At length Partigues was forced with his companie to retire backe to the towne of Leith, and the Englishmen pitched downe their campe, and planted their ordinance beside the said hill.

The lord Greie being in Inskelburgh, sent to the queene regent, that late as then in the castell at Edinburgh, desiring an abstinence of warre for foure and twentie houres, that in the meane time he might send some of his counsell to declare to hir the cause of his comming with that armie, and to commune of such things as might stand the shedding of blood.
The queene granted herevnto, and sent an herald to Leith, to cause the said assurance to be taken: but yet he came to the towne, the skirmish aforesaid was begun with forwardnesse (nough of both sides).

In this meane time, the lord Greie sent sir George Howard, and sir James Cross to the castell of Edinburgh, to speake with the queene to that effect: who had long conference with hir vpon the blocke-house at the vtter gate of the castell, during the time of the skirmish; where they declared, that the occasion of the comming of the armie, was for the cause aboue mentioned, desiring the queene to procure the Frenchmen to depart the realme of Scotland: and they promised in that case to returne againe into their owne realme, and neither to disquiet Frenchmen nor Scots. Whereupon the queene toke time to be aduised till the next day, that she might consult with the principall personages within the towne of Leith, requiring that it might be lawfull for hir to send to them to that effect, which was granted.

The next day she sent one Drummond a trumpetter, or herald (as saith Lelleus) with a letter to monsieur de la Brosse, to the effect aforesaid, directing him to passe to the English campe, and to get a guide with him to go to the towne of Leith, as was agreed: and there was one appointed to go with him.
But immediatly after his departing from the English campe, he was suddenlie called backe againe, and his letters taken from him, was commanded to repaire to the castell of Edinburgh to the queene, and to declare to hir that they would not haue anie talke, but would be reuenged on the Frenchmen, for the slaughter of their men the night before. Thus the parole ceassing, the siege was inforced with right sharpe pursute, and strong defending on either part.

The Englishmen cast trenches vpon the southeast side of the towne, and raised a little mount which they called mount Bellam after the capitaine name, and placed their ordinance aloft thereon: but because it was so farre from the towne, they did not so much scath thereto as they intended. The lord Greie, lieutenant of the English armie, lodged (during this siege)

siege) within the towne of Leith, in the deanes house, and the most part of their demillances and other housemen late in the same towne. The Scotsmen with their capitaine lodged in hailes, tents, and panitions, upon the south and southeast side of the towne of Leith, and diuerse Scottish lords incamped with them in the fields, as the earles of Argyle, Arrane, Morton, and Glencairne; the lords Bots, Ogiltrie, the prior of Saint Andrezus, the maister of Sparwell, and others. The duke of Chateleraut, and diuerse with him remained in Holie rood house: and with the quene in the castell, the bishop of S. Andrezus, the bishop of Dunkeld, the earle Sparshall, the lord Erskin capitaine of the castell, maister James Macgill cleirke of the register, the promost of Douglas, called maister Abraham Cheichton, and diuerse others.

On Easter euen, capitaine Wood, and capitaine Deshicke, seruing on the sea vnder maister Winter the English admerall there, were appointed by him to passe by the riuer to Blackenelle, who with their bands going aboard into a barke prepared for that purpose, sailed forward: and on Easter day in the morning, presenting themselves before the castell, it was yelded to them by certaine Frenchmen that were within, and thereupon it was deliuered to the keeping of James Hamilton, an ancient gentleman; and capitaine Wood, being set on shore, came to the campe before Leith by land. On blacke Monday, the Frenchmen, issuing forth of Leith, set upon the Englishmen in their trenches, and did much harme: as in the English historie it further appeareth. During the siege thus afoze Leith, the quene regent was soze bered with sickenelle, but neuertheless, she continued to labor for agrément, not ceasing to send to the lords for to haue the matter taken vp. And for the better accomplishing of hir desire, she procured the earle of Huntley to come forth of the north, who toke by his lodging in Edinburgh, and toke great paines to treat betwixt the quene and lords for some agrément: but when he perceiued his travell to be in vaine, he returned into the north againe, and left the siege lieng still as hee found it.

In this meane while, the Englishmen, lodging on the southside of the towne beside mount Bellam, battered with their great artillerie at the parish church of Leith, and at saint Anthonies kipple, in which the Frenchmen had laid certaine peeces of artillerie, and at length beat it downe: but perceiuing they could not do anie great hurt to the walles on that side, they cast new trenches vpon the south and southwest side of the towne, and raised a mount there, naming it mount Summerfet, & placed there on certaine peeces in batterie, and so beat the walles, that a great part thereof was ouerthrowne, and a breach made. Whereupon the Englishmen & Scots on a morning came with their ladders, and presenting themselves to the assault, found the breach nothing reasonable; so that although they egerlie pressed forward to enter the towne, yet they were fiercely beaten backe with great slaughter and bloudshed on both parts, but namelie of the assailants.

The Englishmen, perceiuing that they were too rash in assaulting the towne, being not assaultable, deuised other thifts to obtaine their purpose, raising an other mount of earth on the west side of the water of Leith, and named it mount Falcon. Aloft on this mount, when it was brought vp vnto a great height, they planted their great artillerie, which continually beat into the towne, soze annoieng them within, but speciallie beating the houses and places by the thore side, so that none might go by nor downe the towne on that part, without danger to be slaine.

with shot from that mount. The Frenchmen, during the time of the siege, manie times issued forth towards the lands, and sometimes towards the trenches, so that sundrie soze skirmishes chanced betwixt the Englishmen and them, with the slaughter of diuerse, both of the one part and the other. Amongest other of them within, there were slaine two Scottish men of name, to wit, capitaine Kenedie, and young Henrie Drummond: and of them without, there was slaine a Scottish gentleman, called the lard of Cleisch.

The English armie was thoughtlie furnished with vittels forth of all parts of the realme, and that vpon reasonable prices: but the French within the towne could get none, more than they had provided before the comming of the English armie, which when it began to faile them, they were constrained to eat their owne horses, whose flesh seemed to them in that necessitie more delicious, than before that time anie manner of venison. Those within Insketh also were in great necessitie of vittels: but yet neither they within the one place, nor they within the other, would render their strength, looking still for aid forth of France. * Whilest these things were done in Scotland, the French king, to shew how he fauoured the pope, and how farre he maligned the reformed lords of Scotland, sent his ambassadoz John Babone a Burdseie knight, and that eloquent man Anthonie Paret of France to pope Pius the fourth of that name, to yeld all the dominions of France & Scotland at the popes commandement.

In the meane time, the quene regent, perceiuing hir sicknесс so to increase, that she looked for present death, sent for the duke of Chateleraut, and all the lords of Scotland that were in the towne of Edinburgh, and in the campe: who came vnto hir altogether into the castell of Edinburgh, where she made vnto them a graue and pithe exhortation, persuading them to vnitie and concord with their ancient friends of France; and now more steadfast to them than at anie time before, by reason of the mariage of the quene their god soueraigne, with the king of France. And herewith she brake out into certaine words, to dissuade them from the amitie contracted with the Englishmen, declaring that the Englishmen assted them not for anie other respect, than for their owne turne and commoditie. Whereupon, for hir owne part she said, that she fauoured the weale of the realme of Scotland, as much as France; considering she had the honor to be quene and regent thereof, and hir daughter heritable quene of the same.

Furthermore she said, that if she had attempted anie thing that seemed or appeared to the noble men contrarie thereto; the same came to passe rather for lacke of wisdom and iudgement, than for want of aies god will: and if it pleased God to prolong hir daies, she would be glad to amend that had bene done amisse: and if he called hir to his mercie, she praied them most hartlie to acknowledge their dutie vnto the quene their soueraigne, and to mainteine their ancient amitie with the king and realme of France, & to make some god accord with the French that were within the towne of Leith, who would gladly accept the same, to the end that as well they as the Englishmen should depart this realme. For she feared greatly (as she said) least if the Frenchmen departed, the Englishmen would still remaine, and subdue the land to their obedience: and therefore she besought all god Scottishmen to haue respect to the libertie and weale of their countrie.

After she had talked thus a god while with manie teares, she desired the lords to forgive hir in anie thing wherein she had offended anie of them, during the time of hir being in Scotland, which they gladly seemed secured to do: and on the other part, the forgaue them with all hir hart (as it appered) all offenses which they had committed against hir: and thus diuerse of them weeping, she toke euerie of them by the hand, and so they taking leaue of hir, departed, and returned into Edenburgh, and to their campe. Whilste the siege thus laie before the towne of Leith, diuerse great troubles rose in sundrie parts of the realme, and speciallie betwixt the earle of Huntleie, and the earle of Atholl, so that there was taking of prisoners, and overthrowing of houses on either part, and great preparation made; and armie put in a readinesse to invade either others countreies.

But this businesse was pacified by the trauell and good mediation of maister Alexander Gordon, then postulat of Gallowaie, maister John Lesle official of Aberdeen, and William Lesle the young lard of Buchquhan, who agreed them for all matters in controuersie, & caused them to go to either others house. [During which siege of Leith also, the earle Bothwell, and Sarlatouie, then capteine of the souldiers, and gouernor of the castell of Dunbar, did at Dunbar with many light excursions intercept many of the English and Scots going to Leith, whome they ransomed for a great summe.]

At the same time, one maister Donald Frasier, archdeacon of Rosse, toke the bishops castell of the canonic of Rosse, and kept the same against maister Henrie Stinclair, then bishop there, and the chiefest men of authoritie in that diocesse, as Wachenze, Balnagoun, Foulis, and the shiriffe Cromerchie, who assembled about the same, and besieged the castell, where great force was used, both by them without to win it, and of them within to defend it. The bishop being then resident in Cromerchie castell, hearing that the house wold not be gotten without great slaughter, thought it against his conscience, his profit, and honor, to win it in that manner: and therefore sending for maister John Lesle, official of Aberdeen, and maister Alexander Dunbar, subchantor of Purreie, by their labour and diligent treating in the matter, the bishop by reasonable appointment recovered his castell of them that held it against him.

The French king, vnderstanding in what distresse his men remained that were besieged within Leith, and perceiuing himselfe not able to send an armie to succour them within the time that their necessitie required, thought good to trie if the matter might be taken vp; and to that effect sent two ambassadoz, the earle of Randon, and monsieur Ponluc bishop of Valence, who declared to the quenes maiestie of England, the cause of their comming; which was, to desire hir to retire hir armie south of Scotland, vpon some such reasonable conditions as might be agreed vpon. And herewith they declared that they were sent to the quene, and not vnto the subiects of Scotland: for it was not meet that the king should send to his owne subiects (as they were by the marriage of their quene) to require peace, or to condition with them for agreement.

The quenes maiestie of England therefore sent sir William Cecil knight, hir principall secretarie, and doctor Motton deane of Canturburie and of Poike, one of the priuie counsell; with the French ambassadoz into Scotland. Whilste they were yet vpon their iourne, the quene regent (whome they thought to haue found alitie, and to haue used hir helpe as an instrument to haue furthered the treatie to some good end) consumed partlie through melancholie, thought, and grievous displeasure, and partlie with long and incurable sicknesse, departed this life in the castell of Edenburgh the tenth of June, in the yere of our Lord 1560. Her bodie was first conueied into France, to the monastrie of Feschampe, which is in Normandie; from thence it was caried to the abbete of St. Peter at Rhemes in Champaigne (whereof hir sister was then abbess) in which it was after most honorable buried. She was a wise and vertie prudent princeesse, and in hir time had learned good experience of the nature and inclination of the nobilitie and people of Scotland.

During the time that she was regent, she kept good iustice, and was well obeyed in all parts of the realme in Beremeie, and the westerne Isles. And if she had to hir owne experience ioined the counsell of the nobles and wise men of the realme of Scotland, without following the aduise of strangers, there had bene neuer question nor debate betwixt hir and the nobilitie, as some deemed. But because that others, and namelie, monsieur Dossell, and Ruber, were adioined to hir by the estates of Scotland, who daile pressed hir to deuise new alterations of lawes, impositions, taxations, and such things as were not in vse in Scotland: therefore the estates and people of the land did grudge, although not for anie misliking they had of hir, who suerlie deceased, to the great griefe and lamentation of the whole number of the estates and people of the realme.

The death of that noble princeesse made the French men within Leith, and also the ambassadoz more discouraged than otherwise they would haue bene. But neuertheless these foure ambassadoz of England and France comming to Edenburgh, entered in conference among themselves, vpon articles propounded as well for reliefe of the Scottishmen, as for the weale and suertie of the quene of England and hir subiects. Wherevpon certeine lords of Scotland were admitted to talke with them also: and after long treatie, a peace was concluded the tenth of Iulie, in the yere of God 1560, with certeine articles touching as well Scots and French, as Englishmen. The effect whereof here insueth.

Articles of the peace.

Item, it was agreed, that all the Frenchmen should depart south of the realme of Scotland by sea into France, & to that effect should imbarke and make saile within the space of twentie daies next following: and because the Frenchmen had no ships, the Englishmen should lend them ships, and certeine of the Frenchmen remaine as pledges in England, till the same ships were returned.

2 Item, that they should render the towne of Leith, and the Frenchmen to haue their munition, bag, and baggage, to conueie awaie with them at their pleasure, and that the wals of the towne should be thowne downe and demolished.

3 Item, they should cause monsieur Charlebois capteine of Dunbar, to demolish and race the fort which they had built before the castell there.

4 Item, that the Englishmen should raise their siege and depart south of Scotland: after the departure from thence of the Frenchmen, and racing of the wals of Leith and Dunbar.

5 Item, that there should be made an act of oblivion, in which the quene of Scotland, with consent of the French king hir husband, should forget and burie in oblivion all attempts made by the lords of Scotland against their authoritie, from the tenth day of March 1558, to the first day of August in the yere of Grace 1560. And for confirming thereof, a parlement should be holden in Edenburgh, in the moneth of August next insuing, in which parlement the same should be ratified and allowed by the aduise of the estates of the realme of Scotland.

6 Also it was agreed, that there should be a commision mission sent from the French king and the quene of Scotland, to hold the same parlement to the effect aforesaid.

7 Item, that the quene of Scotland and king of France should cause to blot out and put awaie the bearing of the armes of England out of their scutcheons.

8 Item, it was agreed, that there should remaine still in the Ile of Inskith thre score Frenchmen, and as manie in the castell of Dunbar, to keepe (as it were) possession to the quenes vse.

The whole number of the Frenchmen (a few excepted that passed through England) went aboard the English ships in Julie, and sailed into France, and in companie with them went the bishop of Glasco and the lord Seton. The Englishmen departed also, and in their way caused the fort of Dunbar to be rased, as by the agreement of the peace it was appointed. A parlement was holden in August, and the act of oblivion ratified by the states, & a confession of faith published in the same: it was concluded also to send ambassadors into England, which was done. And shortly after, the lords summoned the principall learned men of the realme forth of the universitites of saint Andrews, Aberdeen, Glasco, and other parts, to give a reason of their faith.

And amongst other of Aberdeen that toke upon them to dispute with John Banor, John Wullocke, and maister Goodman [were John Lelle (doctor of both lawes, chiefe iudge of the diocesse of Aberdeen called official; who shortly after was senator of the high court, and of counsell to the quene of Scots, and lastlie made bishop of Ross) Patrike Spirtoun the treasurer, James Stragubine canon, and Alexander Anderson a verie graue divine. At that time these Roman prelats behaved themselves so well, that they were commanded not to depart the towne; but to be present at the sermons of the ministers.]

In the winter, the lords of the counsell gave faculties of benefices to diuerse of their friends, who put forth the prelats, and receiued the fruits. The earle of Argyle disposed Dunkeld and Dunblan. The earle of Arran had the ordering of the bishopricks of saint Andrews, also of the abbasies of Dunfermling, and Melrose, and other small benefices. The like was vsed by other noble men, through all parts of the realme. Shortly after, Francis the French king, husband to the quene of Scotland, departed this life in December, and Charles his brother was crowned in his place. The quene being then widow, and Dowager of France, departed from Douleance (where the court lay when hir husband deceased) and went to the towne of Reims in Champagne, where she remained till the fifteenth daie of Aprill following.

And then purposing to returne into Scotland, she toke hir iourne towards Januille, and so into Lorraine, there to take leaue of hir kinsfolke by hir mothers side. The bishop of Glasco, and the abbat of Dunfermling Scottishmen, were still attendant on hir in this iourne. There were with hir also the cardinals of Lorraine and Guise, the duke Daumale, and the marquess Walbent hir vnclies. Amongst whom there had bene great disputation touching the quene of Scotlands returning into hir owne realme, wherunto hir vnclies were verie willing; although some did seeme to staie the iourne, whose speeches tended to this effect as followeth.

That the iourne was dangerous, especiallie because the quene of England did not greatly fauor it; then that she should come to men by nature barbarous & seditious, which would not easilie obey the gouvernement of a man. Whereof she had fresh examples before hir eyes, of hir father, and of hir mother, whome (when they either could not or durst not openlie oppresse) they forced to a desperation of things with their manie deuises, with they daile liued by them in danger of honor or of life.

On the contrarie part, they which would haue the Dowager of France returne to hir naturall countrie, and were skillfull of the affaires of Scotland, did allege that those seditious were rather occasioned by the default of the kings & gouernors, than of the subiects; whilst they strived to reduce that kingdom (which from the beginning had alwaies bene free) to infinit bondage, and to the free power of the lawes: which that nation (being more warlike than welthie) could not indure. When contrarilie, they did not onelie defend all their gouernors (which did not attempt the ouerthrow of their liberties) from the outward enemie, and from the inward tumults of the people: but they also made them (through loue and dutie towards their kings) inuincible ouer their enemies, and famous amongst strange nations.

And that the chiefeest meane at this time to pacifie all those troubles in Scotland, was not to make alteration of anie thing in Scotland, from the state wherein enen now it standeth. Whereupon the resolved to come speedilie into Scotland, whereof more shall be said hereafter; vntill which, we will intreat of other matters done in Scotland. The quene of Scots hauing hir mind still settled vpon hir returne into Scotland; Paulus a senator of Burdeaux landed before this in Scotland (whither he was sent) a little after the end of the publike parlement; for which cause he was staied and turned ouer to the next assemblie of parlement, which was appointed the twelue kalends of June.

But when at that time also the nobilitie assembled did not sit in counsell, because they were yet uncerteine of the quenes mind; in the meane time James Steward returned out of France; and brought with him a commission, which gave them authoritie to hold a parlement, therein to treat and conclude of matters touching the common wealth. Whereupon in the end there was audience giuen to the ambassador, the effect of whose legacie was; to renew the old league with France, to vndo the league with England, and that prelates should be restored to their liuinges, out of which they had bene thrust by violence.

To these things it was answered, that concerning the league of France, they were not anie waie guiltie of the breach thereof; and contrarilie that the French had manifoldlie neglected the same; but speciallie of late; in seeking the authoritie of their publike libertie, in that they would haue brought the people (their friends and gittles of anie euill) vnto miserable seruitude. For the league with England, they could not by anie meanes dissolue that, except they should be counted most vnthankfull, recompense so great a benefit with great wickednes, & conspire against the defendours of their liberties. And as touching restitution for such as they called prelates, they did acknowledge that they had not anie office, vse, or authoritie in the church.

In this counsell also it was decreed, to ouerthrow all the monasteries of monks, for which cause diuerse were sent out into all places of the realme to execute the same. By occasion thereof, the quene being in France, and desirous to haue peacefull landing in Scotland; would not for this present meddle with religion, but dissembled the same: although Durens abbat of Ferline, and John Sinclair late appointed bishop of Brechin, did vehementlie persuaade and labor hir to the contrarie.

Abbridged out of the printed booke thereof.

In this yeare also on the ninth of March, was the election of superintendents at Edinburgh, which was published to serue for the election of all other ministers in this forme following (John Knox being the minister thereof.) First was made a sermon, in which these parts were intreated; principallie the necessitie of ministers and superintendents. Secondly the crimes & vices that might disable them of the ministerie. Thirdlie the vertues required in them. Fourthlie & lastlie, whether such as by publike consent of the church were called to such office, might refuse the same.

The sermon finished, it was declared by the same minister John Knox (the maker of that speech of sermon) that the lords of the secret councill had giuen charge and power to the churches of Louthian, to chuse maister John Spotswood superintendent, & that sufficient warning was made by publike edict to the churches of Edinburgh, Louthithgue, Striueling, Treuent, Haddington, & Dunbar, as also to earles, lords, barons, gentlemen and others, which haue or might claime to haue voice in the election to be present that daie at the same houre. And therefore inquisition was made, who were present, and who were absent.

After this was called the said maister John Spotswood; who answering to his name, the minister Knox demanded, if anie man knew anie crimes or offenses of the said Spotswood, that might disable him to be called to that office. Which thing thise demanded, there was after question moued to the whole multitude; if there were anie other whome they would put in election with the said Spotswood. When the people were asked whether (if they admitted the said Spotswood for their superintendent) they would honor and obeye him as Christs minister in euerie thing pertaining to his charge.

Whereunto the people answered that they would, which thus granted, there were further questions and matters touching the articles of the apostles creed, and concerning the state of religion propounded to the superintendent, intended to be created. Whereunto, when he had answered affirmatiuelie, the people were againe demanded for his allowance; which they easilie granted with the consent of the nobilitie. These things thus performed, and a certeine praier (to obtaine the spirit of God to be pouered into this new elect vessel) finished, the rest of the ministers (if there be anie) and elders of the church present, in signe of their full consent, shall take the elected by the hand.

And so the chiefe minister giuing an especiall benediction (the forme whereof is there set downe, with the exhortation which they must also vse to the elected) this election is wholie finished (without anie imposition of hands on his head) and he sufficientlie created a superintendent minister; of whose election of elders, deacons, excommunications, and other ecclesiasticall regiment, I meane not to speake anie more (as matter impertinent to my discourse, though not to the nature of an ecclesiasticall historie) sith I haue onelie here in hand the politicall and temporall gouernement, and not the discourse of religion and essentiall forme thereof.]

Before this, in the beginning of the winter this yeare, the lords sent the earle of Morton and Glen-carne, and the young lard of Leidington secretarie, ambassadoys into England; to giue thanks to the queens maiestie of England, for the aid which they had receiued of hir, to expell the Frenchmen. The earle of Murraye passed through England into France. He departed from Edinburgh the eighteenth of March, and in Aprill came to Vitrie, as hereafter shall appeare; where he found the queene, meaning to submit himselfe. But the day before he came, maister John Lesle officiall of Aberdeen was come thither, who was sent from the earle of Hunt-leie, and other the lords spiritual and temporall of the north parts; he took ship in the rode of Aberdeen, and landing at Bule in Holand, passed through the lowe countries in post till he came to Paris, and from thence vnto Vitrie aforesaid [the eighteenth kalends of March] where he found the queene, whom he most dutifullie saluted.

After which (being most courteously receiued of hir) he opened vnto hir the effect of his ambassage, which consisted speciallie vpon these parts; to admonish the queene that she should not suffer hir selfe to be blinded or deceined with the flattering words of James the prioz of saint Andrewis (hir bastard brother) for his onelie dytt was, that he (hauing no French aid with him into Scotland) might obtaine of the queene the whole gouernement of the kingdom, vnder the colour whereof he might moze easilie teare & cleane ouerthrow the catholike religion; which he did assault by all meanes possible.

Wherefore Lesle did with all the firmest aduise and counsell which he might, urge the queene not to yeeld to his cloked words. For the obtaining of which demand from the queene, he did sitlie ad to his persuasions, that James did rather aspire to the kingdom, than that he fired his mind and eye vpon the ouerthrow of religion. Wherefore, if she had anie care of hir owne and the realms affaires; she must prouide that this James should remaine in France, untill she were arrived in Scotland, & had pacified all the tumults there.

But if she would not do so, that yet at least she should take order, that she with hir naue should land in the north parts of Scotland, & first go to Aberdeen: for by that meanes she might prouide, that the select lords of the religion might some be pacified, and the rest which were yet wauering, might moze easilie and willingly be brought againe to the catholike religion. For there was an other order to be vsed in Scotland, than that which the French obserued, whilst they gouerned there; at which time vndoubtedly the Scots were hopelesse euer to haue inioied the presence of the queene.

But now, sith that the Scots doe vnderstand, that their queene (contrarie to their hope) will retorne vnto them, hir presence will (like the rising sun) so cause the clouds of all tumults to vanish out of the minds of all hir subiects, that they will easilie incline to the mind of the queene, whatsoeuer she shall thinke, attempt, set downe, or decree, in restoring of religion. For the Scots are of that mind towards their princes, as they will in all things obeye their vpright gouernors; and are accustomed with no lesse mind to resist tyrants, if they vsurpe vpon them in exaction of authoritie.

Wherefore Lesleus did earnestlie persuaide the queene in the name of the earle of Huntleie, and the other nobilitie, that she should not giue hir selfe (as vanquished) into the hands of the enemies, and especiallie of James Stewart hir brother, from whome (as from a founteine) all their seditions haue had beginning. For James Cullen (kinsman to the earle of Huntleie, an expert seruitor in the warres by sea and land) was sent forth with Lesle (as capteine of that iournie) to bring hir safe to Aberdeen. For all the nobles of the north provinces will soone be ready with twentie thousand men to gard hir to Edinburgh, and to defend hir against all the counsels, deceipts, and forces of all men.

Which message being thus ended from the mouth of Lesle, the queene commanded him not to depart from hir, untill she returned into Scotland; and further Euerie nation is to haue his peculiar gouernement in religion, as is best liking to the godlie disposers of the religion of that countrie, sith vulgus monstris multorum capit.

furthir gaue in charge, that letters should be written to the pères and nobilitie of Scotland, to let them vnderstand of hir comming into Scotland, & to be a witness of hir good will vnto them. The next day after came to the quene at Vitrie, in Champaigne, James Stewart (which is toucht a little before) the prioz of S. Andrews. Who after he had in re-uerence done his dutie, bound himselfe with all fi-delitie, trauell, and diligence, most religionlie vnto hir; faithfullie further promissing, that he would prouide that the Scots should willingly obseie hir, without anie fozren powers to be brought by hir into Scotland.

For it was thought that he went into France for that purpose, to dissuade the quene that she should not bring any power of the French with hir. But in the end, uttering his mind more fullie, and putting alwaie all suspition of deceit, he did with more fami-liaritie request the quene to honor him with the erldome of Murray. Wherevnto the quene did courteouslie answer, that she would satisfie his request when she came into Scotland. Wherefore, when this James perceived that the quene was somewhat well bent towards him, and that she credited his words, he attended on hir vnto Jancuile, and there remaining with hir a certeine space, did after go into Scotland (as is before said) to prepare the minds of the people, that they might receive the quene comming into the realme, with good content and dutiful honor; who passing through England, came into Scotland in the kalends of Maie.]

The duke of Chateaufort, the earles of Hunt-leie, Atholl, Marthall, and all other the noble men of the realme, aduertised of the quens comming, assembled at Edinburgh with all possible diligence.
In the meane time, whilst the quene was preparing to take hir iourne, and to come into Scotland, the quene of England let forth some of hir great ships to the seas, to watch & guard the coasts of hir realme.
Whereof they being aduertised in France, sent the abbat of saint Colmes Inch to the quene of England, to desire of hir a safe conduct, in case by wind or tempest she chanced to land in England. But before he was returned to Calis therewith, as he was appointed: the quene and hir retinue were fasslie landed in Scotland; nevertheless, the English ships toke some of the Scottish lordes, as the earle of Glentoun his ship, and others, which were brought into England, and staid for a time; but were after released, and sent home into Scotland.

The quene also, by the aduise of the K. of France, sent monsieur Doissell into England, to passe through the same into Scotland before hir coming, there to haue received the forts of Dunbar and In-keith, of monsieur Charlebois, and to haue kept the same till hir comming. But he was staid, and passed no farther than to London: for it was thought that his going into Scotland would furrie to no great benefit of that realme: because that he & monsieur Andrie were the principall authors of all the troubles in Scotland, betwixt the quene regent, and the nobilitie there. She was attended on from Paris vnto Calis with manie noble men; namelie hir vnckles, the dukes of Guise, and Daumall, the cardinall of Lorraine and Guise, the grand prioz, and the marquesse Dalbeuf, also the duke de Penecurs, and other of hir friends and kinsmen.

There were two galleies prepared, and certeine other ships to go with hir into Scotland; and there went with hir three of hir said vnckles, the duke Daumall, the grand prioz, and the marquesse Dalbeuf: also monsieur Dammille the constable some, and diuerse other. She arrived at Leith the twentieth day of August, in the yeare of our Lord 1561, where she was honorablie receiued by the earle of Argyle, the lord Erskin, the prioz of saint Andrews, and of the burgesses of Edinburgh, and conueied to the abbeie of Holie rood house. For (as saith Buchanan) Fr. Thin. when some had spread abroad hir landing in Scotland, the nobilitie and others assembled out of all pays of the realme, as it were to a common spectacle.

This did they, partlie to congratulat hir returne, & partlie to shew the dutie which they alwaies bare vnto hir (when she was absent) either to haue thanks therefore, or to preuent the slanders of their enemies; whereof not a few by these beginnings of hir reigne did gesse what would folloio; although in those so variable motions of the minds of the people, euerie one was verie desirous to see their quene offered vnto them (vnlooked for) after so manie haps of both fortunes as had fallen vnto hir. For when she was but six daies old, she lost hir father among the cruell tempests of battell, and was by great diligence brought vp by hir mother (being a chosen and worthy person) but yet lest as a prie to others, by reason of ciuill seditions in Scotland, and of outward warres with other nations, being further laid abroad to all the dangers of frowning fortune, before she could know what euill did meane.

For leauing hir owne countrie, she was nourished as a banished person, and hardlie preserved in life from the weapons of hir enemies, & violence of the seas. After which, fortune began to flatter hir, in that she honored hir with a worthy marriage, which in truth was to this quene rather a shadow of ioye, than anie comfort at all. For shortly after the same, all things were turned to sorow, by the death of hir new yong husband, and of hir old and græued mother; by losse of hir new kingdome, and by the doubt-full possession of hir old inheritable realme. But as for these things she was both pitied and praised; so was she also for gifts of nature as much loued and favored; in that, beneficiall nature (or rather good God) had indued hir with a beautifull face, a well composed bodie, an excellent wit, a mild nature, and good behauior; which she had artificiallie furthered by courtlie education and affable demeanour.
Whereby at the first sight, she won vnto hir the hearts of most people, and confirmed the loue of hir faithfull subjects.]

Being thus come out of France, she brought into Scotland manie rich and costlie iewels of gold work, pretious stones, orient pearls, & such like, as excellent and faire as were to be found within Europe; with rich furniture of household, as hangings, carpets, counterpoints, and all other necessaries for the furnishing of hir princelie houses. The chiefest part of the hangings and other furniture of household, was shipped at Rone, and arrived at Leith in the moneth of October next following. After the quene of Scots had remained the space of foure or foue daies at Holie rood house, the duke of Chateaufort, the earle of Argyle, and diuerse other of the nobilitie being present, there was an act made by the lords of the counsell [in which none of the cleargie (as saith Lesleus lib. 10. pa. 580) were present] with consent of the quene, that to remouie all causes of trouble in time to come for the matter of religion, it was ordeined, that no alteration of the estate of religion publickly standing within the realme, at hir arrivall in the same, should be made; & that nothing should be attempted, either publickly or priuatly to the contrarie, vpon great paine, which was put forth and published through all parts of the realme with great diligence.

After this, there were eleuen temporall lords, and one bishop chosen to be of the quenes secret counsell, by whose aduise the should rule and gouerne things, six of them to remaine continuallie with hir in roome of officers, as the secretarie, comptroller, and others. The lords of the privie councill were these, the duke of Chateleault, the earle of Huntleie chancellor, the earle of Argile, the earle of Atholl, the earle of Marthall, the earle of Glencarne, the earle of Morton, the earle of Montrose, the earle of Erroll, master Henrie Sinclair bishop of Ross, and the lord Erskin, with the prioz of S. Andrew. * But among these reioisings of the quenes intertinement into hir kingdome, there happened a light fault, but such as did deepele enter into the minds of both the factions, of the catholikes (forsooth) and of the reformed religion.

For where it was agreed by the quene and the nobilitie, that no alteration should be had of religion in the publike state, yet was masse permitted to hir and to hir familie privilie to be vsed. For the preparation therof willett the vestments and other things were caried through the hall into the chappell, one of the companie snatched awaie the war candels and brake them: by occasion whereof (if some of the household had not come betwene to helpe in that action, and ended the same) all the other furniture had bene throwne downe. Which matter was taken of people diuerslie, some blaming it as a most sawcie part; others interpreting it, that it was onelie done to trie the patience of the priest; and some iudged and said that the priest was worthy to be punished with that paine which the scripture appointeth to idolaters.

Which matter in the verie beginning was appeased by James the quenes ballard brother, not yet created, but in expectation earle of Morreie. For which cause he would not offend the quene, as I suppose, though after ward he not onelie offended hir, but deposed hir, and set vp hir sonne; as moze plainlie shall hereafter appeare. At the quieting of this matter (saith Buchanan) George Gordon was greatlie grieved, being a man bent to all occasions of troubles, who thinking now to win fauor to him thereby, did say to the quenes vncles that were present, that he would reduce the countrie beyond Callidon vnto the old religion. The which being indeed suspected of manie, and feared by such as had heard manie other things of his wit; they caried the same to the quenes brother, by meanes whereof this little sparke in the beginning was the occasion of all the long ciuill dissention in Scotland, as I am led to iudge by manie reasons.

But now although the gouernment (as before is touched) was appointed to twelue before named, or at lest to six, which by turnes should be assistant to the quene; yet the whole deed of ruling did in effect depend vpon hir ballard brother James, by reason of the fauor that the quene especiallie did beare vnto him. Wherefore this James, vsing the quenes authoritie at his pleasure, did bestow manie liberall gifts vpon his fellows. Which the nobles so much disliked, that in the end manie of them began egerlie to beare his authoritie, as hereafter shall be moze touched.]

The duke Daumall, after he had remained with the quene a certeinetime, toke his leaue of hir, and with the gallies returned into France. The grand prioz and monsieur Danuille taried somewhat longer, and passed through England into France. The marquesse Daulbeuf taried in Scotland all the next winter, till the spring of the yere, and then returned into France through England. The towne of Edinburgh prepared great and costlie triumphs for the quenes entering, which she made into that towne in the moneth of September. After this, the passed vnto Striueling, and from thence to Perth, and then to Dundee, and also to saint Andrews, into which townes the was receiued with great honor and triumph. From saint Andrews she returned vnto Edinburgh, where she remained all the next winter. In December there was a great assemblie of all the principall lords, spirituall and temporall of the realme; where it was demanded of the prelats, to grant the third part of the fruits of their benefices to the quene, towards the bearing of hir charges for the maintenance of hir traine, and to susteine the ministers, till some order were taken to mainteine hir household, and a gard to tend on hir, by the annise of the estates.

The prelats agreed for the quenes pleasure to support hir with the fourth part of the fruits of their benefices, for one yeres space onelie, to helpe to beare hir charges, and to susteine hir gard; and in the meane time order might be taken by the aduise of the whole estates for the same. But notwithstanding the refusall of the prelats to paie the third part, the lords of the privie councill made an act, and set forth letters, that all the prelats and beneficed men should be charged to paie yerele to the quenes comptroller and his collector, the whole thirds of all fruits of their benefices; and that it should be lawfull to the comptroller and his deputies, to take the third of what part of euerie benefice where he best pleased, and to deale therewith at his pleasure: also to haue to do with the rents of brotherhoods of common churches, and such like. This order hath bene obserued euer since, not without great grudge of the prelats, and other beneficed men of the realme, and their friends, as well those that professed the reformed religion, as others.

* Whilest these things were in doing, William Spettellan the younger was sent ambassadoz into England, to salute the quene of that realme (as the manner is) & to declare the god mind that the quene of Scots bare vnto hir, & the desire that his mistresse had to haue peace and vnitie preserved betwene them. Besides all which, and manie other demands touching Scotland (which I suppress for manie reasons, because (as Salomon saith) Cor regis inscrutabile, & the mysteries of princes gouernment are not to be laid open to common eyes and eares) this ambassadoz deliuered letters to the quene of England from the nobilitie of Scotland. In which there was a courteous remembrance of hir former fauor and of their good will. Requesting further that the quene of England would shew a publike and priuat liking and friendship to their quene, to the end that the quene of Scots prouoked by hir benefits, might not onelie remaine stedfast in the amitie already begun; but might also (if it were possible) be dailie moze and moze fast bound vnto hir; and they for their parts, would not omit ante occasion with all good will and diligence to continue this amitie.

To which ambassadoz the quene of England made no lesse honorable than wise answer: the effect whereof, because it concerneth matter of great importance, & is long and largelie already set downe by Buchanan, in hir maiesties singular commendation to the whole world in the Latin tongue, I thinke it not necessarie here to repeat; and therefore I do purposele omit the same, least I might seeme by flatterie to intrude my pen into the eloquent speech of hir maiestie; and not being able to deliuer it with such grace as both she spaketh, and Buchanan penneth it, I might dishonor hir; & ouerthrow my selfe, like vnto Aseton. For as he, taking vpon him to rule the chariot of the sunne, was by his insufficiency therefore consumed: with the heat and glorie thereof, so should I in presuming with vnskill to pen the tale tale of such a worthy prince, confirms my credit, in misordering or defacing the maiestie, grauntie, wisdom, and life of his singular wit and eloquence. For which cause, leaving the same, we do in this sort bring backe our pen to the continuance of the historie of Scotland.

The quene of Scots had a brother called John, a man desirous of authoritie, but yet not so severe in mind as was James the other brother. This John easilie perswading himselfe to obey the quene in all things, was the more deere unto her, and most fit for her, desirous (as saith Buchanan, but how trulie I know not) to confound all things. With this John (in absence of the other brother James) she did consult to hire a companie of souldiers to be about her, the cause whereof was this. In the night there was a tumult or stir, as though the earle of Arran would, in the absence of the nobilitie, secretly set upon the quene, and by strength have labored to carie her to his castell, which was foureteene miles from thence. All which seemeth likely to be but a tale, either for the quenes mind that was estranged from him, or for the immoderat love which he bare unto her: both which were sufficientlie known to the common people. Which tumult being spread abroad, these souldiers after they had all night scowred the fields, riding up and downe hither & thither, they shewed themselves the next day before the court gates, to the offense of some, and the iell of others.]

The sunday before Shrove Tuesday, being the eight day of February (as some write) James Stewart then p̄tor of saint Andrews, and earle of Mar, base brother to the quene, was made earle of Arrere, [in place (as saith Buchanan) of the earldome of Mar, which belonged to John Arskine] by the quens speciall gift, and was married the same day unto Agnes Keith, daughter to the erle Marshall, with great feasts and triumphs, lasting three daies. * In which marriage he did so much exceed, that he greatly offended the minds of his friends, and ministered matter to his enemies to speake euill of him; and that the more vehementlie, because he had before time in all his life behaved himselfe far more temperatlie than he did at this time.]

The quene of England desirous to have a meeting betwixt her and the quene of Scots her cosine, sent diuerse messengers with letters, desiring her most instantlie to come to Worke, where she would meet her, to talke with her of diuerse matters, that might make to the confirmation of the amitie and friendship which nature had knit betwixt them, by confution and amittie of blood. And after consultation had with her counsell, the quene of Scots agreed thereto: and so they were appointed to meet at Worke in the moneth of Iulie next following. But when things were prepared and put in a readinesse for the iourne, the quene of England sent word to the quene of Scots, that she could not keepe the appointment made for their meeting; desiring her to haue her excused for that time. Which message was accepted, and so the iourne staid.

Such about this time, or rather somewhat before, as in truth I suppose it was, James Hamilton being duke of Chatelerauld, and father to the earle of Arran, first wrote to the quene, then after went he with her to saint Andrews, and with many prayers requested her that she would upon sufficient pledges deliver him the earle Bothwell, and Calven Hamilton, but he could not obtaine a thing therein at her hands. At what time also the quene went to Dunbarton (which Hamilton held since the time that he was gouernor) to demand the deliuerie of the same into his hands, which was accordingly deliuered vnto her. Shortly after, the quene of Scots toke her iourne towards the north parts of Scotland, and set from Striueling in the moneth of August.

About this time it chanced that the lord Ogilvie, and John Gordon of Finnerat, sonne to the earle of Huntlee, met on the callete of Edinburgh & fought, where (after many blowes and stripes giuen and taken) the lord Ogilvie and his companie were hurt. Wherefore John Gordon was taken, & put in ward at the tolbutth of Edinburgh, out of which he escaped, after he had remained prisoner therein about twentie daies, and toke his waie northward: whereupon followed great trouble shortly after to the house of Huntlee. The quene accompanied with the earles of Argile, Arrere, and Morton, the lord Erskin, and others, passed forwards in her iourne towards the north part, and caused John Gordon of Finnerat to be summoned to appeere and answer the law at Aberdeen, for breaking prison, and hurting the lord Ogilvie. The quene coming to the towne of Aberdeen, was honorablie receiued with diuerse orations, and Latine enterludes, before the grammar schoole and college.

* These things thus done at Aberdeen, as the quene determined to go further, she was intreated by John Lesle a noble man, and follower of the Gordons, to buy safe his house in her waie, being miles from the towne: to which she granted, & went vnto the same. This place, because it was no common place of resort, was thought verie conuenient for the execution of the earle of Arrere, whose death was conspired (as after shall appeere.) Whereupon Lesle, who was not ignorant of this secret counsell, besought the quene that she would not laie such a note of infamie upon him and his familie, that he should seeme to haue betrayed the chiefe brother of the quene, no euill man, and one that was not his enemy, whereby he might come vnto his death at his house. Whereupon it then ceased, and the next night was also quietlie passed ouer at Rothmie, a towne of the Abernethians, because the next day the quene was determined to go to Strabogie.]

Whereupon the earle of Huntlee, having before heard that his sonne was thus summoned, assembled the principall earles, lords, barons, and gentlemen of the north, who came with him to Aberdeen, to helpe his son at the law appointed for his appeerance, which was in September. The earle came vnto the quene himselfe, and at length it was agreed, that his sonne the said John Gordon should returne to prison againe in Striueling castell, there to remaine during the quenes pleasure. But he following the full counsell of some young heads that were with him, neither fulfilled the quenes pleasure, nor his fathers appointment, but attempted to reuenge his extreme handling (as he toke it) upon the earle of Arrere, whom he put most in blame for the rigor shewed against him, but his enterprise toke not effect. And the quene aduertised of his disobedience, went not to Strabogie, notwithstanding there was great preparation made for her in that place, for the receiving of her and her traine: but she went vnto Balthowie, the earle of Athols place, and from thence to Millis, to Larnetwaite, and so came to Inuernesse, and there lodged.

In this meane while, the earle of Huntlee, purposing to attend on the quene at Inuernesse, caused provision to be made in the castell for his lodging. The quene suspecting his dealing, least this should be done upon some policie, commanded the keeper of the castell to render the same to one of her heralds: but it was not deliuered till the next day, and therefore the capitaine of that castell called Alexander Gordon, for refusing to deliuer it, was hanged upon the towne to the bridge. The lord Gordon and his brother John Gordon of Ffinnerie came that night within a little space distant from the towne of Inverness, which caused great feare in the towne, so that there was a diligent watch all that night. The earle of Huntley being come to Kinloss, and hearing that the castell of Inverness was commanded to be given up into the hands of an herald, sent with all diligence to the keepers, that they should deliver it, & returned himselfe to Strabogie.

The quene remained in Inverness the space of foure or five daies, where the principall captaine of the clanes of the countie came to hir, and with a great companie [of the ancient Scots (as hath Buchanan) whereof the chiefe were the Fraisers and Spurreies, balliant families in those parts] conueied hir to Spine, where she was informed that the earle of Huntley had gathered an armie to come against hir, and made their assemble at Spaine. Whereupon, they took with them all the artillerie ouer Spine, and caried the same in carts, and all other kind of munition, and passed forward to Bamf that night. The earle of Huntley all this while came not forth of Strabogie. The quene as she passed forward, rode to the place of Ffinnerie, and there in hir owne presence, caused the keepers thereof to be charged to deliver it, which they refused to do. From Bamf the quene rode to the laird of Gleditis place, called Gledit, and the next day there was great preparation for hir entrie into the new towne of Aberdeen. She lodged one night in the bishops palace, and the next day she was honorablie receiued, and lodged in the prouosts house of the towne, where she remained all the time of hir abode in Aberdeen.

After this, the lord John prior of Coldingham, with diuerse gentlemen, was sent against the earle of Huntley to Strabogie, but he was escaped before they approached. The ladie Huntley receiued them verie courteously, and gaue them good entertainment, and so they returned. There was charge giuen to Louthian, Fife, Angus, Strathern, the Peris, and to the shire of Aberdeen, to come to Aberdeen quarterlie, querie countie to remaine there sixtene daies, and so they did, during the time of hir abiding there. The earle of Huntley sent his wife in message to the quene and counsell, but she was not admitted to come within a mile of them, but commanded to returne. After this, he sent a messenger, offering to enter in ward, till his cause might be tried by the whole nobilitie: but this was refused. In the meane time all the principall of the Gordons that were landed men, were charged to enter into ward. About the same time James Hepburne earle of Bothwell, who opposed pleasure conceived against him, about a quarrell betwixt him and the earle of Arrane, had bene committed to prison in Castles Wyke the last before past, escaped out of Dawdys towner in Edinburgh at a window.

The earle of Huntley, understanding by his friends at the court how things passed, determined to flee to the mountains, but after (trusting to the promises of his friends) he determined to abide battell in a place of some strength. Whereupon in October he came with his armie to Cornethie in Spar. The reason whereof the earle of Spurreie, who at the first had scarce a hundred horsemen with him, began with James Douglas earle of Morton, and Patrick Lindesie, to lead an armie against his entrie, and gathered a greater number of eight hundred people of the regions adjoining. Wherefore he first placed souldiers about the water passages, to keepe all those places, that Huntley should not escape, and with the rest went forward on a soft pace, to meet his enimie: whose comming Huntley did aside, with three hundred men, keeping their places, although not a few of that companie were fled from the Gordons the night before.

When the earle of Spurreie was come to the side of a hill, from whence he might see all the marches about him, he incamped there in a slender order of battell. At length the armie met, at what time manie on the earle of Spurreie his side did flee awaie, hauing before giuen a signe to the enimie. But the earle Spurreie, which saw there was no succour in fleeing, stood to it balliantlie, called his men together, set upon the enimie, caused them (which before followed his men fleeing awaie) now to lie as fast backe as they came forward. Which change of fortune when the traitors that before fled did perceiue, they came afresh and pursued the Huntleys, and (to cleare them from the first fault) committed all the slaughter that was done that daie.

There was killed of the part of Huntley a hundred and twentie, and a hundred taken: but on the other side not one. Amongst such as were taken, was the earle Huntley himselfe, and his two sons, John and Adam. But the father being old and short breasted by reason of his grossenes, was slaine betwene the hands of such as took him, and the rest were late in the night brought to Aberdeen. The quene seemed forie for the earles death. But in Nouember John Gordon was beheaded in Aberdeen, and shortly after the quene returned southwards, leaving foure commissioners in Aberdeen, the treasurer, maister James Spargill, maister John Spens of Canobie, and the laird of Bettarow, to compound for the effects of them that were in the field with the earle of Huntley. Great summes of monie were taken and leuied of them for that trespass. The earle Bothwell was commanded the first halends of December by an herald to yield himselfe againe to prison, but because he would not, he was declared a publick enimie.

The lord George Gordon, eldest sonne to the earle of Huntley, was taken by the duke of Chateaurault his father in law, at Camernoull, and brought to Edinburgh, where he was put in the castell, and after by a iurie conuict, forsalled, and condemned to die, and sent to Dunbar castell, there to remaine in ward, where he continued till the yeare of God, 1565. At this time was a monie miled set upon such as did eat flesh in the time of Lent. The setting forth thereof was not so much for religion, as for publick commoditie, by the iudgement of Buchanan. The archbishop of Dunblane, he came (after an edict made therefore at the quenes comming into Scotland) he did not abstaine from hearing and saying masse, was committed prisoner to the castell of Edinburgh, and the rest that were found in such actions, were confined with promise of a greater punishment to be laid upon them, if they were found of sending againe in that sort.

The quene held a parliament in Edinburgh, where the earle of Huntleys dead bodie was brought present before the estates in the towne, and forsalled. The earle of Northland, George Gordon was forsalled also, and wherle other of their friends. And in this parliament the act of obliuion was ratified and approued, and diuerse other new laws made. This yeare in August, the quene went on progresse into Argyle. This yere deceased the quene of Scots, the nation of the college of St. Andrews, as maister John Strachan sonne of the laird of Clackmannan the prouost of Dunfermline, in place of the first maister John Le. The official of the shire, was promoted, and in the prouosts place, maister James Balfour succeeded. An armie gathered against them.
The lords went unto Dunfreis.

Certaine townes are punished.

nie came to Edinburgh, where the castell shot off at them, and therefore they departed towards Dunfreis, and were receiued by the lord Heris.

The quene hearing thereof, by aduise of hir counsell assembled forth of all the parts of the whole realme an armie, appointing the same to be at Beggar, in the beginning of October, to pursue the rebels. In the meane time, the hearing that the townes of saint Andrews, Dundee, and saint Johns towne, had helped the lords to raise men of warre for their support, passed thither hirselfe, and toke inquisition thereof, giving order in those townes, that no such thing should afterwards be put in practise. But there were none that suffered death for that matter; but diuerse were committed to prison in the north parts of the realme, as the prouost and bailiffs of saint Andrews: also certeine of the towne of Dundee, and saint Johns towne, and other were banished; and diuerse barons, as Lundie, Lango, and Balward, were sent to Aberdeen, and to other parts, where they remained the winter following.

About this time, the quene toke the castell of Tantallon from the earle of Morton, because he was suspected to fauor the rebels. The keeping thereof was giuen to the earle of Atholl. The quene returning to Edinburgh in September, prepared all things necessarie for the armie, and departing from Edinburgh, came to Beggar, where all the noble men with their retinues were assembled the eight of October. From thence they passed forward to Dunfreis. In the meane time, the duke of Chatelerauld, the earles of Murreie, Glencarne, Ross, the lord Ochiltre, the abbat of Kilwinning, the lords of Grange, Cunningham, Herdie, Pettartow, maister James Haliburton tutor of Petcur, and others, hearing of the quens comming with an armie, fled into England: came to Caerleill, where they were receiued, the earle of Bedford at that time being lord lieutenant of the north.

The lord Heris then maister of Marston conueied them to the water of Sulweie, and afterward returned to Dunfreis to the quene, where (of hir clemencie) he got pardon of his offense; and the lords of Lochinwar and Dunlanrig likewise. After the armie had tarried certeine daies, putting direction for obseruing of god order in the countrie, the quene returned to Edinburgh, where she remained all the next winter. The quene sent the maister David Chalmer chancellor of Rosse into France to the king, with letters for his assistance against hir rebels. And shortly after, the French king sent a gentleman called monsieur Maluouier into Scotland, with verie friendlie letters unto the quene, promising his helpe & assistance against the rebels; which message was most thankfullie receiued, and the said Maluouier honorable at his departure rewarded.

The duke of Chatelerauld, and the other lords with him departed from Caerleill to Newcastle upon Tyne, and from thence sent the earle of Murreie, and the abbat of Kilwinning to the quene of England, making sute to hir grace for aid to be restored to their countrie againe. The quens maiestie promised them, that she would send a gentleman to the quene hir sister, and moue hir in their fauors, as she did; and so they returned to Newcastle, where the duke of Chatelerauld, perceiving no other helpe appearing, sent the abbat of Kilwinning into Scotland to the quene with letters, submitting himselfe to hir graces will, and so he obtained pardon for him and his friends, with licence to passe into France, there to remaine the space of three yeares, and shortly after he passed through England, and so came into France, according to his appointment.

The king passed the most part of that winter in the countries of Fife, Stratherne, Striuelingthire, & Bouthian, spending his time in hawkking. The quene remained at Edinburgh with the nobilitie, and because she was conceiued with child, trauelled little abroad. About this time was a new order taken for placing the king and quens name in all their writings and patents. For where, untill this time, the kings name was set before the quens; now quite contrarie, the name of the quene was written before the kings: besides which, afterward the quene hir selfe would onelie set hir name to the writings in place of his and his; and David the secretarie was appointed in his place to haue a stampe of the kings name, to vse when need required.]

In the meane time a parlement was called, to be holden in the moneth of March next ensuing, and summons decreed against the earle of Murreie, and the other lords that remained in England, and also against the earle of Argile, lieng then in his countrie of Argile to heare them forsailed. The French king sent monsieur Rambeneullet into Scotland, as ambassador from him to the quene, with commission, to make the king hir husband knight of the order of S. Michaele. Which with great solemnitie and reuerence was accomplished in the chappell of Holie rood house the tenth of Februarie, being sunday: after the which, the said Rambeneullet returned into France, being highlie rewarded.

From that time that the parlement was proclaimed, and the summons also published, the earle of Murreies friends being in Scotland, neuer ceased to seke all the waies and means they could deuise to state the same: in so much that the earle of Morton, the lord Ruthwen, and the lord Lindseie, secretly persuaded the king to state the parlement, and also to consent to the restoring of the erle of Murreie and his complices, making to him faithfull promise, that if he would follow their counsell, he should be made a crowned king of Scotland absolutelie, and the quene so to haue lesse to doe with the gouernement afterwards, where through he agreed to the m.

And so after the parlement was assembled, the lords of the articles being chosen the seventh day of March, they perceiuing the forsalture like to proceed, and iudgement thereof to be giuen, the eleuenth of March next following, the king with the assistance of the said earle of Morton, the lords Ruthwen, and Lindseie, entered into the quens priue chamber about eight of the clocke in the night, being Saturday, and the ninth of March, where being arrived in warlike manner, the lord Ruthwen declared unto the quene, that they would not suffer hir any longer to haue the gouernement of the realme, to abuse the same by the counsell of strangers, as she had done; and therefore pulled violentlie out of hir chamber David Ritchie an Italian, that was one of hir secretaries, crying pitiously, Infinia, Infinia: and in hir utter chamber they suddenlie slew him with great crueltie. The king himselfe was also present, and his dagger was likewise found sticking in the dead bodie.

The quene was shut by with in hir chamber, and certeine appointed to attend hir, and to keepe all the doores and gates about the palace. The earles of Huntly and Bothwell escaped by a backe window forth in their chamber, whereof the king and his compaignes were right sore. The erle of Atholl and others being with him, departed in the night season by a ferrie ouer the Forth, called the quenes ferrie, and went to S. Johns towne. On the morrow being sunday (the quene being secretlie kept) proclamation was made, that all the lords that had been in parlement

The morrow following being Monday the earle of Argyll, and the other that were summoned, passed to the tolbooth of Edinburgh, & made their proclamation there, that they were ready to answer in parliament, and none appeared to accuse them. After this, it was concluded to hope the quene in Great ward, but by hir politike demeanor, their purpose in that behalfe was broken: for by secret conference with the king, he persuaded him to think, that he had joined himselfe with those that would be his destruction, if it happened with hir otherlike than well, as was no lesse to be doubted, by reason of the high displeasure that he had taken being quite with child: through the which persuasion, and other mis-king of things, he departed secretly with hir in the night season, accompanied onlie with two men, and first came unto Seilton, and after ward from thence to Dunbar.

Whither the earles of Huntlie and Bothwell hastilie repaired, by whose counsell and others then with hir, she caused proclamation to be made in diverse parts of the realme, charging all manner of men in feats of warre, to come unto hir to Dunbar, & to passe from thence unto Edinburgh within fir daies after. She also sent letters to the same effect unto diverse noble men of the realme, who prepared themselves with great diligence to meet hir.
The earle of Argyll, and the rest of the lords being with him, hearing the preparation that was made against them, and perceiving themselves not able to resist, thought good euerie of them to take some particular meane to obtaine remission at the quens hands, which they obtained all of them, except the earle of Argyll, the lords Ruthven, Lindsay, and such other as were with them at the murder of David Rithen. Whereupon they desparing of pardon, fled into England; where the lord Ruthven died at Pelicassell shortly after, as in place ye shall heare.

The earle of Lennox, being partaker with them, came to Dunbar, and got pardon: the earle of Glencarne and the lord of Cunningham head came thither also, and were pardoned. Likewise the earle of Roxburgh purchased his pardon at the same time. The earles of Argyll and Argyll, and the lord Bothwell, sent to the quene for their pardon, and obtained it, being commanded nevertheless to passe into Argyle, and to remaine there during hir graces pleasure, which commandement they obeyed.
The eighteenth of March, the quene went accompanied came to Haddington towards night: and on the nineteenth day, the bishop of saint Andrews, and the Haniltons met hir at Spinksburgh, and so likewise did the lords Levingston, Fleming, Home, Bothwell, and manie other noble men, and conueied hir unto Edinburgh.

She lodged in the bishop of Dunblane lodging, and taried there a certeine space, having with hir the erls of Huntlie, Atholl, Bothwell, Crawford, Marshall, Spenserland, Calmes, the bishops of saint Andrews and Ross, the lords Fleming, Fleming, and diverse other noble men, by whose counsell order was taken for redressing of the state of the realme; whereby the same was shortly brought to great quietnesse. After this, the quene perceiving hirselfe to be nere the time of hir deliverance, went to the castell of Edinburgh, there to remaine till she was delivered of hir birth. In the moneth of Maie, Thomas Seat Shirrte, deputie of Perth, & a priest called sic George, servant to the lord Ruthven, were apprehended for being doers in the slaughter of David, and were hanged and quartered. Their heads were set aloft, the one on the tower in the abbeie, and the other on the nether bow.

In the moneth of April this yere, the bishop of Brechin president of the session, deceased, and in his room succeeded to that bishopricke, a friend and cou-sine to the earle of Argyle, called Campbell. In the end of April, the quene, willing to have the earles of Argyle and Argyll joined with the rest of the counsell, sent for them to come to the castell of Edinburgh, where all griefs and controversies that arose betwixt them on the one side, and the earles of Huntlie, Atholl, & Bothwell on the other side, were referred to the quene, who agreed them, and they all remained with hir the residue of the summer. The quene hearing that the earle of Argyll, the lord Ruthven, and the other their assistants were retained in England, and remained at Pelicassell, she sent maister James A. Haynton chantor of Argyll, with letters to the quene of England, and also to the king of France, and other hir friends there; declaring by the tenor of the same letters the abuse and presumptuous attempts of certeine hir subjects against hir, desiring them not to receive them with in their realmes or dominions.

Shortly after, the quene of England sent a gentleman called Henrie Killigrew into Scotland, with letters and message to the quene, promising to cause them to depart forth of hir realme of England: and withall sent unto them warning to depart betwixt that present time, and midsummer then next ensuing. But in the meane time the lord Ruthven departed this life at Pelicassell, with great repentance of his former life: giving God thanks, for that he had lent him time to call to him for mercie and forgiveness, whereof he did assure himselfe. And from thenceforth the earle of Argyll, and the maister of Ruthven, remained secretly nere to Antioke, and other places of the borders, till they obtained pardon, and were restored. About this time there came from the king of France a wise aged gentleman, named monsieur la Croche, as his ambassador, and remained in Scotland all the winter following.

In the moneth of June, the quene perceiving the time of hir deliverance to approach, wrote unto all the principall noble men of hir realme, to come and re-maine within the towne of Edinburgh, during the time of hir deliverance, where they assembled: and the king hir husband, with the earles of Argyle, Argyll, Atholl, and Mar, remained with hir in the castell; and the earle of Huntlie, Bothwell, and the remnant of the lords lodged in the towne. And upon the nineteenth day of the same moneth of June, betwixt 10 and 11 of the cloche before none, hir grace was delivered of a goodlie man-child, to the great comfort of hir highnesse, and all hir subjects, whereof the nobilitie did greatlie reioice. And incontinentlie all the artillerie in the castell was shot off, and all the lords and people came together in the church of saint Giles, to give thanks to almightie God for his great and beneficiall goodnes shewed to them, in giving to them a prince, and withall made their humble prayers unto his divine maiestie, to indue him with the feare of God, with vertue and knowledge to governe the realme and subjects thereof, when soever the same should fall into his hands.

The same night at seven, there were great fires

The queene remained still in the castell of Edinburgh all the moneth of Iulie following, till she had recovered hir health and strength. In the beginning of August she passed by the water of Forth to Alloa waie, where she remained certeine daies; the earles of Murreie and Mar being of compaignie with hir, and there the king hir husband came to visit hir. The same time monsieur Maluost came into Scotland from the king of France, bringing letters to the queene, who was conueied by the bishop of Ross to Alloa waie, where he was iustallie receiued, courteously intertained, and highly rewarded. The queene of England sent maister Henrie Williegrew to the queene with the like message, reioicing for hir safe and happie deliuerance, who likewise was receiued in most thankfull manner, and well rewarded.

Here is to be noted, that shortly after she was brought to bed, she sent one of hir gentlemen called monsieur Clarimont, with letters to the king of France, and to the duke of Savoy: desiring them to send ambassadores, which in their name (as godfathers) might receiue hir son at the baptisme. Moreover, she sent James Meluine to the queene of England with the like message, desiring hir maiestie to be godmother who by hir ambassadoz Francis earle of Bedford, sent a present to the queene of Scots, (as I. Stow hath noted) a fount of gold curiouslie wrought & enamelled, weighing 333 ounces, amounting in value to 1043 pounds 19 shillings of English monie. These princes were glad hereof, and promised to send ambassadores to that effect, as afterward they did. In the later end of August, the queene accompanied with the king hir husband, the earles of Huntley, Murreie, Bothwell, and diuerse other, went into Peggat land; there to passe the time in hunting, where they remained certeine daies: and returning to Edinburgh, caused the prince to be conueied vnto Striueling castell, where he was committed in keeping to the lord Erskin, after erle of Mar, and his ladie. And from thence the queene went on progresse into Glen Arkenie.

About the beginning of October, Bothwell prepareth a iourne into Lidisdale; where he was hurt with a calxer by a base theefe. Whereupon with vncertaine life he was carried to the castell of Hermitage, to which the queene (hearing of his mishap) came, attended with a small traine from Bothwell, and from thence hauing scene Bothwell, did in short time after returne to Bothwell, whither she caused Bothwell to be brought: after whose comming thither, the queene fell so grievouslie sicke, that she was in danger of hir life, at what time the king came thither vnto hir.

1566.Stow.

In Januarie the king came to Glasgow, where he fell sicke, and removing from thence went to Edinburgh, and the queene accompanied him. She lodged at Holie rood house, but he was lodged at a house within the towne, nere to the Birke a field; within the which, on the tenth of the moneth of February in the night he was shamefullie murdered; together with one William Barre. He was cast into an orchard, and herewith the house was blowne up with gunpowder. [Some giue report of his death, but touch not the manner thereof, onelie saying that he was shamefullie murdered in a morning (a beaute breakfast) by his owne (but unnatural and rebellious) people, whose innocent blood crieth out for vengeance at the hands of God, who in iustice will (when he seeth due time) giue them their portion with malefactors agreeable to their merits.

The earle of Bothwell was then at the first generally supposed to be the principall offender in this most heinous and detestable murder. But the matter was so handled, that he was not onelie acquit by an allgins court, but also shortly after married the queene, who at that time the suspicion that men had already conceived, that she should be also priuite to the murder, was nothing diminished. But as I haue not to deale in that matter, so yet it is manifest, that some of the Scots nobilitie, fore repining and maligning at such the speedie advancement of Bothwell, who (as diuerse men perswaded himselfe, was the principall author of the murder) got them to armes in the ludden, before the queene of Bothwell was advertised of their meaning; they being then at Bothwell's castell, eight miles distant from Edinburgh.

* Thus leaving the lords abills at Edinburgh, we will say somewhat out of Buchanan, of things done by Bothwell & the queene, before that he was taken by these noble men of the congregation, hauing at that time taken armes against hir. After the death of hir husband, whom she had caused to be buried out of harte from Perth. Kitcher hir secretarie, Matie (as was thought) by the meanes of the king of Scots (the queene I say) after that, and also after the clearing of Bothwell from the murder of hir husband, was forceable taken (as she was on hir iourne) by the earle Bothwell, and carried to his castell, where she remained not long, but yet honorable intertained. Which fact of his bred great dislike in the peoples minds, and brought him in danger of his life, had not the queene (of hir clemencie) pardoned him the same.

Fr. Thin.

Buchan. li. 17.

This done, there was a consultation had for a marriage to be solemnized betwene hir and the earle Bothwell, which (after a dispute had betwene this earle and his then wife Katharine Gordon, granted by the iudges spirituall & temporall; and after the solemn bands asked betwene the said earle James Hepburn, and the queene Marie Stewart) was with great solemnitie of the nobilitie (by their hands in writing consenting thereto) consummat at Edinburgh. Against which onelie the bishop of Arkenie was found to resist; and at which monsieur de Crocke the French ambassadoz then in Scotland would not be present: being a thing which did greatly occasion the Edinburghers to mislike of the queene.

Which marriage breeding some euill opinion of the said queene of Scots, not onelie in hir owne realme, but in the mouths of foereine nations, she wiselie consulteth with hir friends, how she might establish her power; and provide to saue hirselfe and hir kingdome from tumults and interfections. Whereupon, first she determineth to send an ambassadoz into France, to reconcile the minds of the king, and of the Guises, offended with this marriage. Which office of ambassage was laid vpon William bishop of Dunblane, with this charge (as saith Buchanan) almost word for word.

First, you shall excuse to the king, and to our vncles, that our marriage (to be consummate) came to their eares, before that we had opened our counsell touching that matter by ante messengers. This excuse (as it were to a foundation) doth leane to the true exposition of his whole life, and chieflie to the offices and duties of the duke of capteine of the Orkneys towards us, euen vnto that day in which it seemed good to me to take him to husband. For the opening of the historie whereof you shall take occasion to treat from the beginning of the last times of his adolescencie (youth, or yeeres of discretion, as we terme it) in this sort.

“ fares (being from the death of his father one of the “ chiefe of the nobilitie) he did wholie dedicate himsele “ to the dutie and service of the princes and kings of “ Scotland, as one bozne of a famous familie for his “ ancient nobilitie, & of great revenues in this king“ dome which he possessed by right of inheritance. At “ that time also he did especiallie and altogether con“ secrate himselfe to our mother, whilste she had the “ gouernement of the realme.

“ In which dutie towards hir, he did so constantlie “ perseuere, that although the greater part of the no“ bilitie, and almost all the towne were fallen from “ hir obedience (vnder the colour of religion) yet he “ would neuer decline from hir authoritie, as a per“ son that could not be twone by anie promises or be“ nefits, or feared with anie threats, or losse of his li“ uings, to neglect his dutie in anie part vnto hir: but “ that he wold rather suffer his principall house, which “ was the head of his patrimonie, with his plentifull “ and pretious store of furniture thereof to be taken “ from him, and all his other lands to be left for spoile “ to the enimie, than violate his faith to our mother.
 “ Besides which, being destitute of helpe both of vs “ and our people (when the English host was brought “ by our domesticall enimies into the bowels of our “ kingdome, which directed their weapons to none o“ ther marke, than that our now husband at that time “ earle Bothwell, should by force be enforced to flee) he “ fled into France, forsaking all his patrimonie, where “ he honored me with all dutie and seruice (that he “ might) untill my returne into Scotland.

“ Neither are those exploits to be omitted, which “ were done by him in the warres against the Eng“ lish before my returne into mine owne countrie, “ where he shewed such parts of warlike valure and “ graue wisdom, that he was iudged (being then ve-“ rie young) meet to haue the gouernment of ancient “ persons, to be made chiefe capteine of the armie of “ the countrie, & also to be chosen or substitute depu“ tie and chancelor: as in truth he was. In which of“ fice he did not deceiue the hope and expectation which “ men conceiued of him. For (by his affaires valiant-“ lie atchieued) he left a singular praise and fame of “ him, as well amongst his owne people, as amongst “ the enimies.

“ After our returne into Scotland, he employed “ all his inbeuoz to the inlarging of our authoritie, and “ spared not to put himselfe in danger, in subduing “ those rebels which dwell about the borders of Eng“ land. The dispatch wherof being shortly performed, “ and they brought to great quiet, he was appointed to “ doe the like in all the other parts of the kingdome.
 “ But as enuie doth alwaies accompanie vertue, so “ the Scots repining thereat, and desirous of innoua“ tion, did laboz to diminish our fauour towards him “ (for his great labozs imploied in our behalfe) in mis“ construing his good deeds.

“ By which in the end they wrought so much with “ me, that we committed him to prison; partly to sa-“ tisfie the minds of such as were emulous against “ him, and could not bzoake the increase of his follow“ ing honor and greatnesse; and partly to appease such “ seditions as were likelie then to breake forth to the “ destruction of the whole kingdome. But he (escaping “ out of prison) got him into France, to giue place to “ the power of his enimies, where he remained almost “ two yeeres next following. At what time the authors “ of the former sedition, forgetting my clemencie to“ wards them, and their dutie towards vs, did raise “ warre, and take weapons against their queene.

“ From thence was he called backe into Scotland, “ & being restored to his former honors & possessions, “ he was againe made generall of all the armie: by “ whose helpe our authoritie began afresh so to flourish, “ that all the rebels (suddenly forsaking their coun-“ trie) were enforced to flee into England, untill part “ of them vpon humble submission were receiued as “ new into our fauour. But those traitors which were “ handled by the rest that were restored (and especiallie “ such, whose offences I had with beneuolence mispro-“ moted) our kinde is not ignorant, and therefore we “ will touch that no more.

“ Neither is it to be ouerpassed in silence, with what “ diligence he deliuered me from the hands of such as “ detained me prisoner, and with what speed (and singu“ lar providence of his) I did both escape from prison, “ and recovered my former authoritie: after that I “ had dispersed the factions of the conspirators and se“ ditious persons. In which result I am enforced to “ confesse, that his dutie and diligence at that time “ shewed towards me, was so acceptable vnto me, “ that I could neuer after forget it. These things al“ though they be great of themselves, yet he hath hi“ ther to increased them with such diligence and careful“ nesse, that we cannot desire greater dutie, or with “ more assured trust in anie man, than we haue found “ in him; untill these last times which followed the de“ ceasse of our husband.

“ But from that time, as his thoughts did seeme to “ tend higher, so his actions did after a sort seeme to be “ more insolent. And although the matter went so far, “ that we were to take all things in the best part: yet “ these things did then most grievously offend me; but “ especiallie his arrogancie, in that he thought that “ there were not other sufficient abilitie in vs, to re-“ compensate his desertings, vntil we gaue our selfe “ to him in marriage. Touching which, at the first he v“ sed secret reasons and counsels: but in the end, when “ he saw them not to succeed after his mind, at length, “ shewing an open contempt of my authoritie, he fled “ to the benefit of violence, and used force (to the end “ his attempt might not want due effect) to bring me “ vnder his gouernement.

“ Wherefore all this course of his life maie be an “ example, to shew how craftilie they can contriue “ their drifts (in attempting great things) untill they “ haue obtained their purpose. For I did suppose, that “ all this his continuall dutie and carefulnesse in spee“ die obsequie of my commandments, had not issued “ from anie other founteine, than of a vehement desire “ to shew his obedience and good will towards me: “ neither did I hope that a litle more fauourable coun“ tenance (which we are accustomed to vse to the more “ worthy persons, to the end to win their minds to be “ more obedient to vs in dutie) should so haue raised “ his stomach (more than anie others) that he would “ promise to himselfe anie larger good will to proceed “ from me towards him, than he had before.

“ But he taking aduantage of all haps, & drawing “ all things (that chanced) to the furtherance of his “ purpose, and keeping all his counsels secret from me, “ did still shew his accustomed dutie, nourished my old “ fauour to him, & secretlie attempted a new thing by “ the helpe of the nobilitie. Which he brought to passe “ with such speedie diligence, that (vnto me) he “ obtained of the peeres of the realme (in the assem“ blie of the parliament here) a writing with all their “ hands set therevnto, for the more credit of the same.
 “ In which writing was contained, that they did not “ onlie assent vnto the marriage; but that they also fur“ ther promised to spend their life and goods (offered to “ all dangers) in the executing thereof, and that they “ would be vnto our enimies to all such as should laboz to “ hinder it. For the more easie obtaining of whose con“ sents in this sort, he had perswaded the said nobilitie, “ that the same was not done against my mind and “ consent. At length, when he had purchased this writ-“ ting from them, he began by litle and litle (with ear“ nest “nest intreaties & flatteries) to obtaine our consent.

 “But when at the first our answers did not content “his desire, he began to laie before me almost all those “things, which are accustomed to happen in the at“tempt of such matters.

“First, the outward tokens of our good favour to“wards him, the reasons by which our friends or his en“mities might hinder the same, & manie other things “which being objected, or willinglie happening, might “frustrate his hope, or change the minds of such as had “before subscribed. At length (fortune favouring him “therein) he determined to pursue the matter, & in one “instance to hazard his hope and life about the same.
 “Wherefore, when he had determined with himselfe, “with all importunitie to attempt the successe of his “determination, he foure daies after having conue“nient time and place therefore in the high waie, set “upon me with a strong band, as I was comming “from seeing of my deere sonne, and with great speed “caried me to Dunbart.

“Which euill deed how greuouslie we toke (espe“ciallie done by him, from whom all our subiects ne“uer looked to haue such things to proceed) euerie bo“die maie easilie consider. For there I did vpbraid “him, with what fauour I haue alwaies vsed him, “what honorable opinion I haue had of him, and of “his conditions in my speech vsed to others, and of his “vnthankfulnesse to me therefore; with all other “things that might deliuer me out of his hands. These “matters I laied against him with bitter words. But “his answers thereunto were more mild, and temper“ed with gentler speeches, in this, that he would still “vse all honoz and dutie towards vs, and labor by all “means to haue our god will, whom he would not of“fend.

“As touching this, that he had against our will car“ied vs into one of our own castels, he humbly craued “pardon therefore (in that he was inforced thereunto) “although in the same he had forgotten that reue-“rence and dutie, which euerie subiect owght vnto vs.
 “Whereunto he added, that he did the same for our “safetie and defense. At which time also he began to re“peat vnto me the whole course of his life, lamenting “his fortune, to haue them (whome he neuer hurt) so “greuouslie offended with him, that their malice had “not ouerpasseed anie occasions vniustlie to hurt him “withall.

“But especiallie in this, that their great enuie had “burdened him with the murder of the king, and that “his power was vnequall to resist the secret conspira“cies of his enemies, whome he could not know; be“cause they did in shew and speeches dissemble their “friendship: & not knowing them, there was no waie “for him to foresee and auoid their deceipts. Whose ex“treme hatred was now growen to such height, that “he could not liue in safetie in anie place, or at anie “time, except he might be assured of the quenes vn“changeable fauour towards him. Which certieintie of “hir fauor could not be shewed but by this one meane, “to persuaide hir selfe to receiue him into the marriage “bed. At what time he did most holilie sweare, that he “gaped not after anie extraordinarie gouernement, “or that he would leape to the highest step of supreme “rule thereby, but onlie to reape this fruit thereof, that “he might serue and obeie hir as long as he liued, in “such sort as he did before. Whereunto he added the de“lights of such speeches as that matter required.

“But in the end, when he saw that we could not be “moued thereunto, either with praiers or promises, “he shewed vnto vs what he had done with the whole “nobilitie, and the chiefe of the parlement, and what “they againe had promised vnder their hands. Which “being suddenlie and vn hoped for laied against vs, “whether it did with iust cause greatlie astonish vs, we leane to the consideration of the king, the quene, our “uncles, and the rest of our friends. Wherefore, when “I perceiued my selfe a prisoner vnder the power of “an other man, farre from the helpe of all those whose “counsel I did and should haue vsed; yea and that I “saw them before my face, in whose former faith and “wisdom I did repose my selfe; whose strength did “defend our authoritie, and without which our power “was but small or none: then (I say) I had some “all these to haue bowed themselves to serue his de“sire, and that I was alone left a prey for him, I did “with my selfe in my mind consider manie things, “but could bring none of them to effect.

“Besides which, he gaue to vs but short time to take “anie aduise, but incontinentlie and importunatlie did “still vage the same vnto me. At length, when I saw “no waie to escape by flight, nor anie person of all our “kingdome which had anie care of our libertie (for we “well perceiued by their hands giuen, and by their “deepe silence at that time, that they were all drawn “to take his part) I was compelled (after that I a lit“tle pacified mine anger & displeasure against him) to “refer my selfe to the discusse and consideration of his “demands, & to laie before my selfe his dutie in times “past, and the hope which we had of the following con“tinuance of the same towards vs.

“And further, how greuouslie our people would “suffer a strange king, and heauilie receiue one vnac“quainted, and not inbred with their lawes and cu“stoms, that they would not suffer me long to liue vn-“married, and that the people (being by nature facti“ous) could not be kept in obedience, except our au-“thoritie were supported and praicised by a man which “could equall them in bearing labor, and were able to “bridle the insolencie of rebels in the administration “of the common wealth: the weight of which charge, “our power (being weakened and almost brought to “nothing by continuall tumults and rebellions, since “our comming into Scotland) was not able anie “longer to susteine. For by reason of these seditions, “we were inforced to appoint foure or more deputies “in diuerse parts of our realmes, which after ward al“so did (vnder the colour of the authoritie which they “were permitted to vse vnder vs) inforce our owne “subiects to take armes against vs.

“For all which causes, when we well perceiued that “if we labored to preferue the dignitie of kinglie ma“iestie, that they would inforce me to marriage, that “our people could not abide a forren prince, and that a-“mongest our owne subiects, there was not anie “which for the nobilitie of his familie, for his wisdom “and valure, or for other vertues of bodie and mind, “might be preferred before or equalled vnto him, “I commanded my selfe to ioine with the whole con“sent of the parlement, and assemble of the nobilitie “before mentioned. After that my former constant de“termination was thus somewhat mollified by these “and other reasons, he did working from me partlie by “force, and partlie by intreatie, a promise to him of “marriage.

“Which done, we could not yet by anie meanes and “persuasion obtaine of him (fearing an alteration in “our mind) that the time wherein this marriage should “be performed, might be deferred so long, as that we “might participat the same with the king and quene “of France, and such other friends as we had remai“ning in those parts. For he beginning with a bold at“tempt (after that he had once thereby attained the “first step of his desire) did neuer after that cease to “ioine importunat praiers to his persuasions and ar“guments of reason, vntill he did without violence “inforce vs to set end to the worke begun, and that at “such time, and after such order, as seemed most con“uenient vnto him for the execution of his determi“nation

" nation. In which matter I cannot dissimble, but " that I was otherwise intreated by him, than either
 " I would, or had deserved.

" For he was more careful to satissie them, by " whose consent (shewed at the beginning) he thought " himselfe to have obtained his purpose (though he did " both deceive them and mee) than to gratifie me, or " to wisie how meet it were for me, being brought up " in the precepts and rites of our religion; from which,
 " neither he nor any man living, whilst I did live, 10 " could draw me awaie (aline) by any action. In which " thing trulie, though we doe acknowledge our error,
 " yet we willingly desire, that the king and quene " his mother, our uncle, or any friend of ours, do not " erposulat with him, nor any waie laie the fault on " to his charge.

" For sith things be now so ended, as that they " cannot be againe undone, we take all things in the " best part: & as he is in deed, so he is to be accounted " our husband, whose from henceforwards we have " determined both to love & reverence. Wherefore all " they which profess themselves to be our friends, " must also shew the like to him which is toined unto " us with an indissoluble knot. And although he hath
 " in many things behaved himselfe lesse diligentlie, & " almost over-rashlie, which we willingly impute to " his immoderat affection towards us; yet we desire " the king, the quene, our uncle, and the rest of our " friends, no lesse to love and favour him, than if all " things had till this day bene done after their advice " and determination; in the behalfe of which our hus- 30 " band, we promise that he shall in all things (which " shalbe required of him hereafter) alwaies grati-
 " fie them in what he maye.

These remedies being found to defend the quens credit amongst forein princes, other remedies were to be sought for defense of hir owne person against hir owne subjects. Wherefore (after that the earle of Sparrre was appointed to remaine as banished beyond the seas in France, whether he take his jour-nie through England) the quene (delivered of such a feare as he was to hir, & therefore better able to rule; or at least to make better shift, with such other as were confuted, to use Buchanans word, against hir) bled that diligence she might to gather forces, especiallie in the spers and east Northian.]

And thinking that the enterprise of the lords had bene broken and disappointed, they marched from Dunbar on saturday the fourth of June, first to Haddington, & there resting till the even, set forward to Gladsmore, and taking there deliberation in the matter; they lodged that night at Setton, and in the morning marched in order of battell towards Carbarrie hill, and there chose forth a plot of ground of great advantage, appointing to fight on foot, because the power of the lords in number of horsemen, was stronger than the quens, and of greater experience. There were with the quene and Bothwell, the lords Setton, Pether, and Bothwellke; also the lords of Melanchton, Bas, Dumfries, Wilederburne, Blackater, and Langton. They had with them also two hundred harquebussiers waged, and of great artillerie some few peeces: Their whole number was esteemed to be about 2000: but the more part of them were commons & countriemen.

The earles of Sparrre, Atholl, Mar, Glencarne, the lords of Hume, Lindseie, Ruthven, Semple, Sandquhar; the lords of Drumlanrig, Colibarden, Grange, and young Setton; were assembled together at Edinburgh with a power like in number to the quens, but for the more part consisting of gentlemen, although not furnished with any number of harquebussiers, except a few of the townsmen of Edinburgh; that willingly toined with them in that quarrell. Upon the fifteenth of June, they came forth of the towne, and approached their adversaries.

 But there was monsieur la Croque, the French kings ambassadour, who took great paine, in travelling betwixt the parties to reduce them to some agreement. * Who by his interpreter laid before them how carefulle he had studied for the commoditie & tranquillitie of the publike state of Scotland before this; and that now also he carried the same mind with him. Wherefore he did vehementlie desire (if it were possible) that the matter might be so taken up, for the commoditie of both parties; that it might be ended without force or bloodshed. For the compassing whereof, he would imploie all his travell, sith the quene also did not refuse to heare the counsell & persuasion of peace. For the more certaintie whereof, he did at that time promise them pardon and bett forgetfulness of all things passed before time; & did with great holinesse there pledge him selfe, that no hurt should fall unto any man there, for taking weapon against the highest governour.

After that the interpreter had delivered these things, the earle of Sparrre answered, that he did not take armes against the quene; but against him that had killed the king. Whome if the quene would deliver to punishment, or separat him from hir; the should well understand, that they & the rest of hir subjects held nothing more due unto them, than to continue in their dutifull obedience: without which granted to them, there could be no agreement made; because they came not thither to craue pardon for any offense which they had committed (whereunto the earle of Glencarne added) but rather to give pardon to such as had offended.]

Wherefore the ambassadour Croque returned backe to Edinburgh, and the quens part began to decrease, diverse speaking awaie from hir; so that after it began to grow towards the evening, Bothwell fled to the castell of Dunbar. But the quene desirous to talke with William Kirkcaldie the lord of Grange, went to him, accompanied onelie with one capteine, and after some talke with him, she passed to the lords, who took hir with them to Edinburgh, [the being in a short garment, bare, & tooke a com-ming a little beneath hir knees (as saith Buchanan) of which lords she requested that they would suffer hir to depart, & not to keepe hir in that fort.] The Ha-miltons were on the waite comming to assist the quene, with seven or eight hundred horsemen; but before they could reach to the place, the quene was in the hands of the lords, and so they returned.

The lord of Cragnmiller [then possessor of Eden-burgh] and sir James Balfoure also the capteine of the castell, were toined in this confederacie with the lords, as shortly after it appeared. The quene after this was conveyed over the Forth, and brought to Lachlenin, where she was appointed to remaine in ward under the safe keeping of William Douglas lord of that place. The earle Bothwell, escaping to Dunbar, found meanes to flee into Denmark, where he was slaine and committed to prison, wherein at length he died. Divers persons afterwards were apprehended as parties to the murder of the king, and thereupon condemned, were executed, confessing the said earle to be the principall executor of the same murder. * Leaving the quene therefore in this miserable plight, we will not yet forget (for the honor she once had) to set downe certaine verses made by Alexander Seton a Scot, in the commen-nation of hir ancestors; and of hir; who in the first yeares of hir government bled hir selfe to the good liking of all hir subjects. In which verses Seton doth further meanie, that Lesle should hereafter set forth hir government, as he hath done that of the said J.

James the sixt.

The nineteenth of Julie, Charles James the young prince of Scotland, after a sermon made by John Inor, was crowned king of the Scots in Sterling church, where were read certeine letters of commission and procuration, with the queens priue seale at them for the establishing of the same coronation. The first, for his resignation of the crowne and gouernement of the young prince his sonne. The second, to authorize the earle of Murray to be regent during the kings minority. The third, to giue authority and power to seuen other joining with the said earle of Murray, in case he should refuse to exercise the same alone; that is to say, the duke of Chastelaunt, the earles of Lennox, Argyle, Atholl, Moray, Glencarne, and Mar. The tenors of which letters of commission and procuration doe here insue, as we find them imprinted at Edinburgh by Robert Lekprieue printer to the king of Scots, the sixt of Aprill 1568, among the acts of parlement begun and holden at Edinburgh, the fiftenth of December, in the yeare 1567, by James earle of Murray lord Abernethie, &c: regent vnto the said king.

The tenor of the commission, whereby Marie the queene of Scots resigneth the crowne to hir sonne, appointeth his gardians, and maketh the earle of Murray regent.

Marie be the grace of God queene of Scottis, to all and sundrie our iudges and ministers of law, liegis and subiectis, quhome it effectis to quhais kinlege thir our letteris sall come, greeting. For samekle as by lang trespone and tedious trauell takin by vs in the gouernament of this our realme and liegis thair of, we are sa verit and ierit, that our bodie, spirit, and sensis are altogether become inhabill langer to trauell in that roome: and thairfore we haue dimittit and renuncit the office of gouernament of this our realme and liegis thair of, in fauours of our anelie maist deir sonne, natie prince of this our realme. And because of his tender youth and inhabillite to vse the said gouernament in his atwin persoun, during his minority, we haue constitute our derrest brother James earle of Murray, lord Abernethie, &c: regent to our said sonne, realme and liegis forsaids.

And in respect that our said derrest brother is actually furth of our realme, and cannot instantlie be present to accept the said office of regentrie vpon him, and vse and exercise the samin during our saids derrest sons minority; we quhill his returning within our realme, or in case of his decess haue maid, constitute, namit, appointit, and by thir our letteris makis, constitutis, namis, appointis, and ordainis our traist consingis and counsalours, James duke of Chastelaunt, earle of Arrane, lord Hamiltoun, Mather earle of Lennox, lord Dornie, &c: Archibald earle of Argyle, lord Campbell and Loche, &c: John earle of Atholl, James earle of Moray, Alexander earle of Glencarne, and John earle of Mar, regentis to our said derrest son, realme and liegis; & in case our said brother James earle of Murray cum within our realme, and refussis to accept the said office of regentrie vpon his singular persoun, we make, constitute, name, appoint, and ordene, our traist consingis and counsalours forsaids, and our said brother regentis of our said deir sonne, realme, and liegis.

Geuand, grantand, and committand to thame, or onie sue of thame coniunctlie full power for our said sonne, and in his name to ressaue resignatiounis of landis, make dispositiounis of wairdis, nonentres, releuis, mariageis, beneficis, eschetis, officis, and otheris casualitets and priuilegis, quhat sumeuer concerning the said office, signaturis thair vpon to make, subscribe, and cause be past through the seillis. And to vse and exercise the said office of regentrie in all thingis, priuilegis, and commo-ditets, siclike as frelie and with als greit libertie as onie regent or gouernor to vs or our predecessours vnto the samin in ony times bigan. Promittand to bald firme and stabill in the word and faith of a prince, to quhat sumeuer thingis our saids traist consingis dois in the premillis.

Charging heirfore to all and sundrie our iudges and ministers of law, liegis and subiectis forsaids, to answer and obeie to our saids traist consingis, regentis forsaids in all and sundrie thingis concerning the said office of regentrie, during our said derrest sons minority, and ay and quhill he be of the age of seuentene yris compleit. As he and like are of to will declair to our saids subiectis to our said maist deir son, your natie prince, and vnder all paine, charge, and offense that he and like are of to make commit and incur against his maiestie in that part. Subscript with our hand, and giuen vnder our priue seill, at Lochleuin, the fourte and twentieth day of Julij, and of our reigne the five and twentieth yir.

The commission, authorising certeine noble men in the queens name, to renounce the kingdome to hir sonne, and authorising others to receiue the same in hir sons name.

Marie be the grace of God queene of Scottis, to all and sundrie our iudges, and ministers of law, liegis, and subiectis, quhome it effectis, to quhais kinlege thir our letteris sall come, greeting. For samekle as sen our arruall, and returning within our realme, we willing the continuall commoditie, welth, profect, and quietnes thair of, liegis, and subiectis of the samin, haue employit our bodie, spirit, baill sensis, and foris, to gouerne the samin in sic sort, that our roiall and honzabill estate might stand and continue with vs, and our posteritie, and our lussing and kind liegis might insaie the quietnes of true subiectis. In trauellling quhairin, not anelie is our bodie, spirit, and sensis sa verit, broken, and bruiet, that langer we are not of habillite be onie meane to indure sa greit and tollerabill painis and traueillis, quhair with we are altogether ierit, bot als greit commotiounis and troublis be onie occasiounis in the meantime be onie baill, for our greit greit.

And being it has bene the plesur of the eternall God,

God, of his kindlie lufe, mercie, and gudnes to grant unto vs, of our atwin persoun, ane sone, quha in cais be the hand of God we be possessit, will, and richt, and of equitie man, and aucht to succede to us and to the gouernement of our realme. And knawing that all creaturis ar subiect to that inuincibill decret of the eternal, aims to rander and gif by this life temporall (the hour and time quhair of is most vncertane) and in cais be decreit we be taken fra this life, during the time of his yuinozitie, it maie be dovit greittie, that resistance and trouill maie be maid to our said son, now native prince of this our realme, in his tender yeres (being swa destitute of us) to succede to that royaume and kingdome, quhill maist iustlie of all lawis, apperteneis to him. Dubill inconuenience be Godis helpe and gud providence we mene to prevent, in sitch maner, that it fall not lie in the pouer of onie pynaturall subiects to resist Godis ordinaunce in that behalfe. And vnderstanding that na thing, erdlie is maist solous and happie to vs, nor to se our said decret sone, in our atwin life time peccablie placit in that royaume, and honozabill estate quhairto he iustlie aucht and maist succede to: we of the motherlie affectioun we beir toward our said onlie sone, haue renuncit, and dimittit, and be thir our letteris frelie, of our atwin motiue will renuncit, & dimittit the gouernement, guiding and gouerning of this our realme of Scotland, liegis, and subiects thair of, and all intronissoun and dispositioun of onie casualteis, properties, benefices, and offices, and all thingis appertaining, or heirtofore is knawin, or heirefter fall happen to appertein thairto, in fauouris of our said decret sone. To that effect, that he maie be plantit, placit, & possedit thairin, be & exerce all thingis belang and thairto, as native king, and prince of the samis, & siclike as we or onie our predecessouris, kingis of Scottis, hes done in onie times bypast.

Attour, that this our dimissoun maie tak the maist solempne effect, and that name pretend ignorance thair of, we haue giuin, grantit, and committit, and be thir our letteris, geuis, grantis, & committis our commissioun full, fre, and plane pouer, generall, & spectall command, to our traist coussingis, Patrike lord Lindesae of the Birs, and William lord Ruthuen, and to ilk ane of thame coniunctlie and seuerallie, to compeir before sa monie of the nobilitie, clergie, burgessis, and ither pepill of our realme, as fall happen to be assemblit to that effect in our burgh of Strivelling, or anie ither place, or placis quhair it fall be thocht maist conuenient, at onie date or dais, and thair publiclie in thair presence, for vs, in our name, and vpon our behalf dimitt, and renunce the gouernement, guiding, & reuling of this our realme, liegis, and subiects thair of, all intronissoun with the proprietie, casualtie, or itheris thingis appertaining to us thairby, and all richt, and title that we had, hes, or maie haue be onie maner of way thairto, in fauouris of our said son, to that effect, that he maie be inaugurat, placit, and rowmit thairin, and the crowne rotall deliuerit to him, and be obeit in all thingis concerning the samin, as we, or our predecessouris hes bene in times bypast.

And in likewise be thir presents geuis, grantis, and committis our full, fre, and plane pouer, to our richt traist coussingis, James earle of Moroun, lord of Dalkeith, John earle of Atholl, &c: John earle of Mar, &c: Alexander earle of Glencarne, William earle of Penteth, John maister of Graham, Alexander lord Hume, Adam bishop of Dunkeld, the processis of Dundie, Montrois, or onie of thame, to ressaue the said renunsiatioun, and dimissoun in fauouris of our said son, and thair efter the ressaueing thair of, to plant, place, and inauguraish in the kingdome, and to do all ceremonies requirit to put the crowne rotall vpon his heid; in signe and takin of the gubailking of him thairin, and in his name to maid, and gif to the said nobilitie, clergie, burgessis, and itheris our liegis, his prince and kinglie with desuillie, & laudhullie as effectis and to ressaue thair althits, for tuerne laudhull homage to be maid be thame to him, in all times coming, as becomis subiects to thair native king and prince: And generallie all and sundrie ither thingis to do, exerce, and do, that for sure performance and accomplishment heirtofore maie, or can be done, firme and stable hold, and for to hold all and quhairsum euer thingis in our name, in the premissis leidis to be done, in the word and faithfull ppointis of ane prince. And ordanis thir our letteris (gif neid be to) to be publiit at all places neidfull. Subscriuit with our hand, and giuin vnder our prentie seill, at London in the fourth and twentieth dais of Julij, and of our reigne the five and twentieth yere, 1567.

The commission, in which the earle of Murreie is alone appointed to be regent of the yoong king, and of his kingdome.

Maie be the grace of God, quene of Scots, to all & sundrie our iudgis, and ministeris of our lawis, liegis, and subiects, quhome it effectis, to quhais knalege thir our letteris fall cum, greting. Forsamuche as efter lang, greit, and intollerable painis, & labouris takin be us sen our arrivall within our realme, for gouernement thair of, and keeping of the liegis of the same in quietnes, we haue not anellie bene verit in our spirit, bodie, and sensis thairby, bot als at length at altogidder sa verit thair of, that our habilitie, and strength of bodie is not habill langer to indure the samin: thairfore, and because nathing erdlie can be maist confortabill and happie to us in this eird, nor in our life time, than to se our deir son, the native prince of this our realme, placit in the kingdome thair of, and the crowne rotall set on his heid, we of our owin fre will, an speciall motiue, haue dimittit, and renuncit the gouernement, guiding, and gouerning of this our realme of Scotland, liegis, and subiects thair of, in fauouris of our said son, to that effect: that in all times heirefter, he maie peccablie, and quietlie enioie the samin, without trouill, an be obeit as native king, and prince of the samin be the liegis thair of.

And vnderstanding that (be resoun of his tender youth) he is not of habilitie in his atwin persoun to administrate in his kinglie royaume and gouernement, as equitie requiris, quhill that heirefter he cum to the yeres of discretioun; and als knawing the proximite of blude standand betuixt us, our said sone, and our derrest brother James erle of Murray, lord Abirneith, &c: and hauand experiance of the naturall affectioun, and tenderlie lufe he hes in all times borne, and presentlie beires towardis us, the honour & estate of our said sone; of quhais lufe and fauour towardis him we can not bot assure our selfe: to quhome na greter honour, loy, nor selektie in eird can cum, nor to se our said sone inaugurat in his kingdome, seirit, reuerencit, and obeit be his liegis thair of. In respect quhair of, and of the certanetie, and notozitie, of the honestie, habilitie, qualification, and sufficiencie of our said derrest brother, to haue the cure and regiment of our said sone, realme, and liegis forsaids, during our said sonis yuinozitie: we haue maid, namit, appointit, comittit, late, and ordaine, to be thir our legatoris names, pap-pointis, thakis, constitutis, and ordanis, our said ver-rest brother James erle of Murray, regentis and said derrest sone, realme, and liegis, foirsaidis, during his minority and less age; and ay and quhill he be of the age of sentene yeres compleit. And our said brother be callit, during the said space, regent to our said sone, his realme, and liegis.

So was our said sone after the completing of the yeres foirsaidis, in his abuin person may tak vpon him the said government, and ple, and exerce all and indyie privilegis, honours, and vtheris mannitis that appertenis to the office of ane king, als weill in gouerning his realme and pepill, according to the lawis, as in repressing the violence of sic as wald inuaid, or insullie resist him or thame, or his authoritie resist. With power to our said derrest brother James erle of Murray, in name, authoritie, and behalfe of our said maist deir sone, to ressaue resignatiounis of quhat summeuer landis baldin of him, or of offices, castels, towris, fortalices, millis, fishings, woodis, benefeits, or pertinencis quhat summeuer, the samir againe in our said sonis name to gif, and de-liuer signaturis thair vpon; and vpon the giftis of wairdis, nonentrentis, and releuis of laidis, and mariageis of atris falland, or that fall happin to fall in our said sonis handis as superiour thair of.

And als vpon presentatioun of lairdis, benefeits, eschettis of gunds monabill and vnmouabill, dettis and takkis, respittis, remissounis, superceduris, and vpon the dispositioun of offices vacand, or quhen they fall happin to baik, to subertie, and can be past the seillis the said office of regentrie, to be and exerce in all thingis, p'suilegis, and commoditeis, sichlike as frelie, and with als greit libertie, as ony regent, or gouernour to be, or our predecessouris hist in ony times bigane, and sichlike as gif euer heid, priuilege and artiele concerning the said office luer at leny effreidit and amplitit in thir our letteris. Promissand to bald firme and stabill in the word and faith of ane prince, to quhat summeuer thingis our said derrest brother in the premissis happinis to do. Chargeting heirfor zow all, and indyie our iudgis, and ministeris of law, liegis, and subiertis foirsaidis, to answer and obey to our said derrest brother, in all and indyie thingis concerning the said office of regentrie, as ze and ilke ane of zow will declair zow lussing subiectis, to our said maist deir sone, and vnder all paine, charge, and offense that ze and ilke ane of zow may commit, and thir againis his maiestie in that past. Subscriuit with our hand, and gentin vnder our prente seill, at Lochleuin the 14 day of Julij. And of our reigne, the twentie five yetir.

These commissions being read, the bishop of Argyle, with two superintendents, proceeded to the coronation: the earle of Morton, and the lord Home toke the oth for the king, that he should rule in the faith, feare, and loue of God, and to mainteine the religion then preached and exercised in Scotland, and to persecute all aduersaries to the same. The whole ceremonie was done in the Scots English tong, the quene mother to the king remaining at that time prisoner in Lochleuin. * But before we enter into the augmentation of the historie of this kings time, I thinke it not vnmeet to deliuer one thing, which I haue with some wonder obserued in all the kings of Scotland descended of the Stewards: that neuer ante one of them except the first and second king of that name was of the age of man, or of one and twentie yeres when they put on the kinglie ornaments. A rare thing, and not vnmeet to be considered of, although we can not enter into the seuerall iudgements of God. The proofe of which matter, being after this sort, I haue set downe in a calendar of the orderlie descent of those kings. In the conspectioun of the yeres of those age, and first comming to the crowne, I haue followed Lesleus.

Robert Stewart the first king of that surname, was 27 yeres old when he began his reigne, in the yere of our redemption 1370. John Stewart son of the said Robert began his reigne 1390. These two aloud were of full age, when the title of the kingdome descended vnto them. James Stewart, the first of the name of James, the third of the name of Stewards, was within age at the death of his father, when the title and crowne descended vnto him: who although he received not the crowne at Scotland (because he was about eightene yeres honorable kept as a prisoner in England) untill he was of mans age: yet being king in right, and the crowne inuessed in him when he was within age, I doubt not to make him king from the death of his father, him to within age to haue obtained the kingdome; though not the kinglie use thereof, beginning his reigne in the yeres of our redemption 1424.

James the second, and the fourth of the Stewards, was six yeres old when he was crowned, in the yere of Christ 1436. James the third, and sixt of the Stewards, being seven yeres old, was crowned king of Scotland in the yere that the word became flesh 1460. James the fourth, and first of the Stewards, being sixteen yeres of age, was adoned with the ensignes of the kingdome, in the yere of our saluation 1488. James the fifth, and the seuenth of the Stewards, being one yere, five mo-neths, and ten daies old, was crowned king of Scotland, in the yere from the birth of Christ 1513. Marie the eight of the name of Stewards, being but seven daies old, was crowned quene of Scots, in the yere of Christ 1542. Henrie Stewart, sonne to the thirde earle of Lennox, and husband to the said Marie Stewart, was not one and twentie yeres old, when he came to be king in the right of his wife Marie: for he was not past one and twentie when he was slaine, as before in the yere 1567. Charles James Stewart, the first of the name of James, and the ninth of the surname of Stewards, sonne of the said Henrie Stewart and Marie Stewart, being about a yere old, began his reigne in the yere that God became man 1567. To whome Andrew Mel-vine (this yere 1585 in England) did whilist he was in Scotland dedicate these verses following:

*Dum tu, magne puer patribus das iura vocatu, Et populi pensas crimina lance pari, Iura tibi, cum ille Solon, cum ille Lycurgus, Qua recti et puri fontibus hausta dedit, Nobilium regum exemplis obsecrat auris, Hic, ubi quid fugias, quidue sequarum habes.
Felix si fugias fugienda, sequenda sequarum!
Felix cum populo ius patris, tuo.*

There was order taken by the magistrates of the reformed churches, assembled for that purpose, touching the discipline of excommunication, and the ercommunication, diuided into these heads: that is to say, what crimes be worthy of that seuer censure of the church by excommunication: how the minister shall behaue himselfe in publike audience of the people: of confession of the penitent: of the offenses which merit publike repentance: of the order to proceed therein: the forme and the order of publike repentance: an admonition to the church: a thanksgiving for the conuersion and repentance of the censured: the forme of the ercommunication: the prayer for the obstinate that will not repent after that censure: the prayer before the ercommunication:

cation: the matter to invocate the name of Jesus, with the sentence of excommunication: the order to receive the excommunicate againe into the church: the forme of the absolution: and lastlie the praier for the church. Which booke containing the discourse of these matters at large, with authoritie of scriptures and reasons, was set forth by John Inor minister, and commanded to be printed by the generall assemblee, in the yere of Christ 1569, beinge scene and allowed by those which follow, appointed to that function by the said assemblee: whose names were John Willike, maister John Crage, Robert Pont, John Row, David Lindcote, William Christison, James Greg, &c.

Parlement holden at Edinburgh.

On the fifteenth of December a parlement begun, beinge holden at Edinburgh before the earle of Murraye lord regent, in the which divers acts and statutes were devised, made, and ratified: as first concerning the quenes demission of hir crowne, and resignation thereof made to hir sonne king James the first. And likewise concerning the instituting of the earle of Murraye in the regencie of the realme, which he toke upon him the two and twentieth day of August last past, according to hir letters of commission and procuracion aboue specified. Also there was an act made for the abolishing of the pope, and his usurped authoritie. And an other act for the annulling of former acts made in parlement for maintenance of superstition and idolatrie. And hereto was annexed a confession of the faith and doctrine received by the protestants of the realme of Scotland, authorized in the same parlement. There was also an act made for the indemnitie of those that had lenied warre, and apprehended the quene at Carbarrie hill, the fifteenth of Julie last past, and concerning the detaining of hir in Lochleuin.

An act for the abolishing of the popes authority in Scotland.

The castell of Dunbar and the lostrelle of Insketh to be rased.

Fr. Thin, Buchanan, lib. 19.

Moreover, it was ordeined by an act passed in this parlement, that the castell of Dunbar, and the lostrelle of Insketh, should be demolished and rased downe to the earth. To be briefe, there were one and forty acts of statutes made and stablished in this parlement, as by the register thereof it maye appere. * In the first beginning of the spring, the gouernour determined to make a progresse ouer the realme, with the iudges that were appointed to administer law: which he ment to doe, to the end that he might amend and establishe such things as were indamaged by the tumults of the yere before. Which matter working diuerse opinions in those of the quenes faction, did cause that Metellane and John Balfurie sought meanes to deliuer the quene out of prison. Touching which matter also the Hamiltons labored who (being next to the crowne, if the yong king were gone, and the quene made astate, both which perhaps was no great matter to procure) did some with the quenes faction and fauourers. Whose part in like manner the earles of Atholl and Huntly refused not to take, because the mother of the one, and the wife of the other, were of the familie of the Hamiltons.

William Murraye of Tillbartine, for his contrarie opinion in the controuersies of religion, and for priuat quarrels, being estranged and grieved from and with the gouernour, did not onelie now depart from the kings faction (although before he shewed great diligence in taking the quene) but did also drave with him a great companie of his friends intified thereunto with no small hope of benefit to rise vnto them thereby. And as these were heads and chiefe of such as sought the quenes deliuerance: so there were a great manie other, whom priuat necessity, secret grudge, desire of reuenge, hope of advancement, and neerenesse of alliaunce to those which are before named, procured to follow, and to further the cause of the quenes libertie. In the meane time, whilst the regent was at Glasgowe to minister law to such as required it (and that he had there heard of these things) his determination of setting the quene at libertie was put in execution, the manner whereof was in this sort. There was in the castell of Lochleuin, wherein the quene was kept as prisoner, the mother of the regent, and three of his brethren by an other father, with a great troupe of women: but none were admitted to see the quene, save such as were well knowne or sent thither by the regent.

Of all this household companie, there was none that seemed so meet to the quene to execute anie matter, as was George Douglas the yongest brother of the regent, being a man of a pleasant wit, and easilie to be overtaken with the faire speeches of women. This man had accesse vnto the quene to playe at cards, and to vse hir with other courtlie pastimes: who determining to set hir at libertie, did with promises and gifts win the seruants of the castell to fauour him and his enterprises. Whereupon this Douglasse (not unwitting as was thought to his mother) omitted nothing that might seme to serue for the quenes libertie: the which although manie there did perceiue & toke not in verie good part, giuing intelligence therof to the regent; yet he gaue such credit to his owne people there, that he changed (as hath Buchanan) none of the keepers in that place, but onelie commanded his brother George to depart out of the Iland. This said George, when he passed into the next countrie adioining to the lake, in which the castell stood, did more liberallie than before (by corrupting the keepers with monie) consult with the quene of all hir affaires.

Wherefore not onelie the Scots (whome the present state of things did mislike) being draven into that faction; but also the Frenchmen by James Hamilton (which had bene regent not manie yeres before) and James archbishop of Glasgowe solicited thereunto; the Scots promised their bodilie force, and the French promised their helping purse. Now about the end of Aprill, an ambassador came out of France requiring in the name of his king, that he might haue leaue to go to the quene: which if he were denied, he made shew that he would presentlie depart. Whereunto the gouernour answered, that it was not in his power to grant it: that the quene was not committed to prison by him, and that he could not determine anie thing herein without the knowledge which first restrained hir of libertie, and after by decree confirmed that deed: but he would not cease in pleasing his sister, and such a friend as the king (his maister) was, to doe all that he might: and further, that he would take order for an assemblee of the nobilitie the twentieth daie of the next moneth. Untill which time the ambassador seemed somewhat appeased, and the regent applied the administration of the lawes.

On the daie the second of Maie, in the yere 1568, at supper time, the quene escaped out of Lochleuin, by the meanes and helpe of George Douglas brother to the lord of Lochleuin. The lord Seton, the lord of Rcarton, and James Hamilton of Dalrymple, were readie to receiue hir, and conueyed hir ouer the quenes ferrie, first to publie the lord Seton his house, and from thence to Hamilton castell, where she remained till the thirteenth daie of Maie being thursdaie, gathering in the meane time such forces as she might from all places. The earle of Murraye lord regent was in Glasgowe, at what time the quene escaped out of Lochleuin; and upon knowledge had thereof, ment at the first to haue withdrawen himselfe to Sterling: but suddenly changing his purpose in that behalfe, he determined to continue at Glasgowe, colo, which is not past eight miles from Hamilton, because he was perswaded, that if he should thinke backe neuer so little, he should encourage his aduersaries, and discourage his friends, and so consequentlie weaken his part greatlie. * Which they also supposed was the more weakened, by the departure of Robert Woid (vnto the quenes part) hauing untill that time wone a great opinion of his constancie towards the regent.

This man, being of a famous familie, was now in the decate of his house meanelie and sparinglie brought by vnder his father, a valiant gentleman, and one that followed the frugalitie of the Scots, who (willing to prepare a waie to the readuance of his house, as manie of his other kinned did) was now content to seeke meanes therefore: for which cause both he and his father did first follow the Hamiltons then ruling all things. But after that their gouernement was possted ouer from them to the quene mother the regent; and that contention was moued about religion: he ioined himselfe to the lords of the congregation, from whome his father was most estranged: in which this Robert Woid firmelie continued untill the quenes retorne out of France. By meanes whereof, there was a great opinion of his valure & wisdom, on whose counsell Coline Campbell earle of Atholl did almost wholie depend. But when by chance certeine of the nobilitie had conuined or conspired (to vse Buchanans word) for no euill act, but for the defense of the king, he subscribed to the same league.

But after, with like lightnesse both he and the earle of Argile (which hong vpon his aduise) wrote vnto the quene euerie thing that was done in the same assemblie, from which time this Woid was partaker of all the quenes secrets against his old friends, who with the quene did yet obtaine no greater opinion of constancie, than he did amongst others of lightnesse and inconstancie. But after that the quene was imprisoned, and the earle of Purrie made regent, he went then to the part of the gouernor: with whom he shewed such pwise of his wit and industrie, that he was admitted into the priue counsels of the regent, contrarie to the opinion of others. But after when the matter should be tried by fight betwene the regent & the quene (after hir escape from Lochleuin) he fled againe to the quene.] All which notwithstanding, the thirtieth daie of Maie afore mentioned, the quene with hir power marched from Hamilton, by the south side of Clepe toward Dunbarton; and out of Glasgou on the other part marched the lord regent with his forces: so as at length both the armies met at a place called the Langside, nere to the house of Cathcart within two miles of Glasgou.

The armies met at La. 19 side.

Lords on the quenes part.

Lords on the regents part.

They ioine in battell.

There were on the quenes part the earles of Argile, Caillies, Eglinton, and Rosses, Claud Hamilton sonne to the duke of Chatelerault, the lords Seton, Sumnerhill, Wesser, Worthwike, Levingston, Herries, Haywell, Sauquhar, Woid and Rolfe, lards and knights, Lochinwar, Was, Mauchton, Dalhousie, Rolien the thirde of Aire, sir James Hamilton, and manie others. On the regents part were these accounted as principall, the earles of Dorset, War, Glencarne, Denteith, the maister of Crahan, the lords Hume, Lindlie, Ruthwen, Semple, Ogiltree and Cathcart, of lairds and knights, Bargarwy, Blacquhan, Drumlanrig, Selsford, Lus, Buchanan, Tullibardin, Detour, Grange, Lochleuin, Leithington, and sir James Balfour. At the first ioining there was a verie sharpe encounter: for after they had bestowed their shot of harquebuzes and arrows, they fell to it with speares and swords. But at length, after thre quarters of an houres fight, the quenes part was put to flight.

The victorie remained with the regent, who suffered none to be slaine but those that were killed in the fight, before they turned their backs; among the which were foureteene of the surname of the Hamiltons killed. There were taken prisoners about thre hundred, of which number the principall were these: the lords Seton and Rolfe, sir James Hamilton, and manie other of that surname. Of the regents part, the lord Hume was hurt in the leg and face, and the lord Ogiltree in the necke, by the lord Herries: the lord Lindlie, and the lards of Drumlanrig, and of Grange, bare themselves verie valiantlie that day, falling not in anie point that belonged to the dutie of hardie capteins. The quenes part was thought to be nere at the point of six thousand men, and the regents was reckoned to be foure thousand: so that there were ten thousand men in the field that daie, what vpon the one side and the other.

The quenes part discomfited.

Foureteene of the Hamiltons slaine, prisoners taken.

The earle of Huntlye was coming forwarde to haue assisted the quenes part, but the battell was striken, and hir people discomfited (as ye haue heard) yer he could come, and so he returned. In this battell the valiance of an Hieland gentleman named Macferlane, stood the regents part in great stead. For in the hottest bzunt of the fight, he came in with two hundred of his friends and countiermen, and so manfullie gaue in vpon the flanke of the quenes people, that he was a great cause of the disordering of them. This Macferlane had bene latelie before (as I haue heard) condemned to die for some outrage by him committed: and obtaining pardon (through sute of the countesse of Purrie) he recompented that clemencie by this peece of seruice now at this battell, [which was (as saith Buchanan) fought the thirde daie of Maie, and the eleuenth after the quene had escaped out of prison.]

The quene perceiuing the ouerthrom of hir people, fled from the place where she stood to behold the battell, and withdrew to Crawford towne, and so by the Sauquhar to Dundrenan in Gallowate: and after she had taried there two or thre daies, she took ship and passed to Worthington in England, where she was staied & conueied to Caerleill, and from thence to Bolton castell, belonging to the lord Scrope, who with sir Rafe Sadler (being sent downe for that purpose) had the custodie of hir, till at length she was committed vnto the earle of Shrewsburie. * The French ambassador, which looked for the good successe of this battell, and did promise to himselfe assured victorie on the quenes part, vnderstanding the contrarie, and being deceiued of his former hope, changed his copie, and with horse and guides halled all he could into England, without bidding the regent farewell. In which iourne he was robbed by thieves: but James Dologlasse, capteine of the marches of Drumlanrig, did this honor to the ambassador, that he had all his goods restored vnto him.]

But now to the dwings in Scotland. The regent sent to summon Hamilton castell, but the answer was respited till the next daie: and then he that had the charge came to Glasgou, and offered the keyes to the regent. The castell of Draxan was also yelded at the same time to the regent. The eighteenth of Maie, the regent made proclamation, that the inhabitants of the shires of Perns, Angus, Fife, Mers, Louthian, Kile, and Carricke, should prouide themselves of vittels for sixtene daies, and to meet him at Beggart the tenth of Iune, to ride with him into the south-west parts of Scotland, to chastise certeine theues, and other disobedient persons. Wherevpon, the eleuenth of Iune, the regent marched south of Edinburgh, and came that night to Beggart. There at nine being assembled, contained foure or five thousand land hoymen verie well appointed, beside a thousand footmen, gunners and halberdiers: of boies and young men that went with the carriage, there were about foure thousand.

The castell of Boghall, pertaining to the lord Fleming, was surrendred to them. The twelfth of June Skirling castell was rased (a faire house) to the end that other understanding therof, might be put in greater feare. That night they came to Crawford, where the castell was to them surrendred; it belonged unto sir James Hamilton, whom they had in their hands. The thirteenth of June they marched to Saucher, a castell, the which being rentred they spared, because the lord Cheichton the owner thereof, promised at a certeine daie to come to the regent to Edinburgh. The fourteenth of June they came to Barbacast, where they late that night, and the lord Mederborne was sent to speake with the lord of Louchinware. Wednesday the fifteenth of June, they marched to a place called saint John Scilaghan, skaiing there in trust of the lord of Louchinwares comming unto them, but he came not: whereupon, the next daie being the sixteenth of June, they rased the house of Benmure, and an other house also, for that the owners were friends to the said Louchinware.

The seventeenth of June they came to a gentlemans house, standing by the water of Mr., where diuerse gentlemen came in, and were receiued. The eighteenth of June they marched to Dunfreis, and remained there all the next daie. A strong house standing in that towne, & appertaining to the lord Sparwell, was offered unto them. Diuerse of the Sparwells, Johnstons, Wretwines, Grahams, and Wels, came unto the regent, and offering themselves to be obedient, were receiued. Two daies before this, the lord Sparwell, the lords of Johnstons, Colvhill, and Louchinwar, had bene at Dunfreis with a thousand men, and spent all the vittels. It was thought that the lord Sparwell would haue come in, if the other had not counsellid him to the contrarie. The twentieth of June they marched to Hoddum, a place belonging to the lord Herries: a thousand of the broken men were assembled and offered skirmish; two or thre were taken, they late within a mile of the regent that night.

The one and twentieth the house was yeilded, and the custodie thereof committed to the lord of Dymilarig that was appointed warden of those marches. It was thought verie strong, so that the defendants might haue kept it longer if they had bene disposed. Great hunger began to pinch the armie, a pint of wine was sold at seven shillings Scottish, and no bread to be had for anie monie. The regent sent forth the earle of Morton, and the lord Hunt with a thousand men, to trie if they might haue taken the broken men to a chase: but it would not be, for they went their waies, and would not carrie it. The two and twentieth of June the campe late still; but the regent with a thousand men went to Anisand, and had it deliuered unto him. Where he met with the lord Scrope, and after returned to the campe. The thre and twentieth of June they went to Lochmaben and receiued the castell, the which the regent deliuered to Dymilarig: but some of the Sparwells being close by hid within an orchard of the house, after the regent was gone, brake out and seized the house againe into their hands.

The same daie two houses belonging to the lord of Johnstons, the one named Lochwood, and the other of Loughboffe, were taken, but not burnt: because the lord Johnstons had put in sweette to come in by a day unto the regent. The same daie they take great store of cattell; and that night with a shot of the great artillerie, they shot two thrones among thre steeple thers that came and approached verie nere to the armie, as the maner of the pickers is. The armie late that night at Millton holms. The foure and twentieth of June they came to Bæples, and the next day to Edinburgh, so ending that iourne, in the which they had passed through the countreies of Clidessdale, Gallowaie, Piddessdale, Annandale, & Tweedale. Such a doo and great trouble arose within Scotland, by reason that the Hamiltons and their adherents made parts against the regent, and those other lords that gouerned under the king; whereof as I haue no certeine notes, so I must passe the same with silence.

* Whilest these things were thus in doing, letters came to the regent from the queene of England: for she was perswaded by such as were fled with the queene of Scots into England, that there was great iniurie done unto the queene of Scots, being burdened with high matters, through the enuie of hir euill subiects, in which chieflie the kingly authoritie was reniled, and the regiment of sacred maiestie defaced. A thing which did not alone pertaine to the priuat person of the queene of Scots, but to the example of all other princes. Which euill of expelling kings, was speedie and soundlie to be prevented, least it might craepe ante further. By which and other persuasions, the queene of England required of the regent to send sufficient men, that should declare to hir the order of all things as they were done, and that should answer all such reproches as were laied against him.

Touching which matter, although it appeared grieuous and heauie in it selfe, to call things in question which before were by parlement established; and to bring in by a new kind of iudgement of their causes before forein iudges and kings who were their enemies, and first perswaded against the regent by such as maliced him and his faction; and that after a sort the same seemed dangerours and full of shame: yet on the other side there were manie things that inforced him to accept that request of the queene of England, although it were vniust. Wherefore when he had determined to send ambassadors, and that they could not agree who they should be, sith the chieftest, and those of the nobilitie refused it: at length the regent professed that he would take that iourne by on him. For the performance whereof he chose certeine persons to accompanie him into England, contrarie to the mind of William Petekian, which onelie denied and stood against it. Wherefore he caried the said Petekian with him (fauoring the queene) not doubting in the end by one meanes or other to win him to his part.

The rest that went willinglie with him, were James Douglas, Patrike Lindseie, being of the nobilitie; the bishop of Dornie, & the abbat of Fernilindon, churchmen; James Macgill, and Henrie Balnane, lawyers of the college of iudges. To whom as the ninth was ioined George Buchanan author of the Scottish historie: with whom the regent accompanied to the number of 1000 hoiles; took his iourne into England, and came the fourth nones of October to Poerke, to the assemble appointed there by the queene of England. On which day, and almost at the same houre, Thomas Howard duke of Northfolke came thither also; to which duke were associat in commission, to heare the controuersie of the Scots, the earle of Suiler, and sir Rafe Sadler knight. After a few daies, came thither such as were sent by the queene of Scots, which did comaine of hir vnkind subiects, and required helpe to restore hir to his kingdome. These men being heard (sundered from the regent and the earls) did (after they had protested that they came not unto them as iudges, hauing aye right to make lawes to him bind them) with manie words open the injuries which the Scottish subjects had done unto their quene, and required of the quene of England, that either they would persuade hir unkind people to receiue their prince againe; or if they refused the same, that she would giue them an armie, with which they might compell them thereto.

In fewe hours after this, the regent (calling the matter to the deciding of law, before equall arbiters) did contend (sith nothing was done but by right, by law, by the ancient custome of their countrie, by the determination of the assemble of parliament, and by the subscription of manie such as were there present to accuse them) that he alone by his authoritie could not vnderstand the same: but when the English commissioners had denied that they could be satisfied with those things done at home, & here pronounced by the Scots, except some cause were shewed that enforced them to senerelie to pronounce against their quene; the regent answered that he did chieslie see that matter, least he should be dynen to accuse his quene and sister. Which he denied to do, not willing to late abroad to forren nations his wicked deeds, as Buchanan fearmeth them. To the contrarie thereof he would not be enforced, vntlesse the quene of England would promise to defend the cause of the now king, and to take him into hir protection: if he did manifestlie proue, that the quene of Scots had murdered the king of Scots hir husband. Whereunto the English answered, that they had authoritie onelie to heare both parts, and to declare their whole request unto their quene.

By reason whereof, in the end they wrote to the quene of England all the state of their doings; who did write backe, that the earle of Murreie should send one or moze to the English court, fullie to informe hir thereof, sith she would do all therein that belonged unto hir. Which letters receiued, the earle of Murreie sent Metellan (a man before suspected, and that did after soine in conference with John Lesle bishop of Rosse) to the court of England, associated with James Macgill. Not long after these men were come to the quene at London, it was thought most conuenient by hir and hir counsell, that the regent himselfe should be present, when all matters of controuersie were intreated vpon. For which cause, sending part of his companie backe into Scotland, the regent came with a small traine to London: where the same difficultie was objected against him which was done at Forke: to which he answered as before. Whilste these things were doing at London, the quene of Scots did by James Balfoure moue warres in Scotland. For the furtherance whereof, she wrote letters to his and Bothwells friends, and made manie deputies to execute hir authoritie in Scotland.

When the regent saw himselfe thus beset on euerie side, he determined to returne with all speed into Scotland as well as he might, without dispatch of that for which he came. Wherefore the English still instantlie vrging him to tell the cause (which being untold, they could not determine anie thing therein) that moued them to do those things in Scotland: the regent (loth to offend the quene of England) made a long protestation how unwilling he was to accuse the quene, and his sister; and therefore requested one thing, that they which were the occasion to lead him into this battell might be present thereat, for because he would be their witness in the weightiest matters. Which for manie great reasons being denied by the English, the quene of England required, that the quene of Scots (by force and armes expelled) might be restored home: & theretofore gining the regent a day, to shew cause whye the reuengers of the kings death had taken armes against the quene; although the erle of Murreie were none of them: for he was in France at the time of the deed done. Wherefore the regent shewing all he could against the quene of Scots for the defense of hir aduersaries; in the end, the quene of England deferring the same to another day, permitted the regent to depart home to appease the troubles there, and that he should leaue some one of his behind him, to answere all such euils as should be objected against him.

But the regent desired them whilst he was there, that his accusers might be brought out. Whereupon the accusers being present, and saing that they had not then anie thing to saie; but that they would further shew their accusation where it pleased the quene: the matter with much controuersie ended on both parts, & the counsell brake vp without anie finall sentence therein. But whilst the regent remained thus in England (as is a little before touched) there were manie things without successe attempted by the quene of Scots followers. For James Hamilton (who a little before had bene gouernor) being grieved with the mishap of things at home, falling out contrarie unto his mind, did therefore depart into France, where (remoued from all companie, and onelie attended vpon with a man or two) he did secretlie liue to himselfe.

But when the quene of Scots was escaped the prison of Lochlenin, and that she was after subdued in battell, being within a fewe daies after compelled to land in England; the Frenchmen that could not draw the earle of Murreie (now by his friends called home into his countrie) into their faction, thought it best for manie reasons (sith they might not for the troubles in France send him succor or monie) to raise by the said Hamilton against the earle of Murreie, and especiallie at that time whilst the regent was in England. Wherefore he committing out of his den abroad into the world, enriched by the French with a fewe golden crownes, and overcharged with manie faire promises, was importuned by his friends and kindred, whilst he hastened from England into Scotland, that the quene of England with the authoritie of the quene of Scots, would induce the earle of Murreie to deliuer by his regentship of Scotland unto him; sith that place was of right due unto him: (by the manners and lawes of all nations, but chieslie by the custome of his countrie) as next rest in blood; and next in succession.

For the proue whereof, it is not necessarie to reckon by the memorie of histories from the first times, considering it is knowne to all men, that gouernors haue bene giuen to those of yong yeares (not able to rule the kingdome) of such as haue bene nereest of blood. For so, after the death of James the third, Robert his uncle had the gouernement in the absence of James the first; and Murbac the son of the same Robert succeeded him therein. And of late time in our remembrance, John duke of Albanie did gouerne the yong yeares of James the fifth; and Hamilton himselfe, in the minority of Marie the quene, that now is, being as then neither fit for a husband or a kingdome, did a fewe yeares rule all the affaires of Scotland. Who now by certaine behs, was through vniuersall voices, eregded there of with force and violence, and that (which is worthy) a ballard is advanced thereto in contempt of lawfull blood and honor, if it were restored unto him, he would shortly appeale all those cruill behs, and restore the quene of Scots unto hir kingdome, without anie force or tumult of armes. Whereunto the king of Scots legats did answer, that Hamilton did not onelie demand a thing quite contrarie contrarie to the lawes and old customs of Scotland; but also a thing most vniust, if no authoritie of law were against it. For our ancestors (by reason of many murders committed by those of the kings blood) almost a thousand three hundred yeares past, did change the order in creating of their kings. For whereas before, they which were of the familie of Fergusius, the first king of that name, were in the life of the king chosen after to reigne, not as nearest of blood; but as persons most worthy to weild a kingdome: Kenneth the third (to the end to take awaie from the court all treacherie towards the kings familie, and cruell murders of kinreds amongst themselves) did establish that order which is now obserued in creating of our kings; which was, that the next in blood should be advanced to the place of the deceased king.

But afterwards, when men were taught by the successe of things, that it could scarce be chosen; but that in such inconstancie of fortune, the right of the chiefest magistrat must sometime light vpon children and vpon heires also vnfit for gouernement, they did ordeine, that he should be chosen to the administration of the publike wealth; which did excell others in wealth and wisdom. Which course our ancestors haue kept almost these six hundred yeares, leauing the kingdome whole & sound to posteritie. According to the which, when Robert Bruce was dead, there were gouernors chosen by voices: which were Thomas Randolph earle of Murrie, 20 Donald earle of Mar, Andrew Murrie, John Randolph, & Robert Stewart. For sometime, as manie were chosen gouernors together; so when James the second was a child, Alexander Levingston, being no kin to the king, no not so much as of the nobilitie, but onelie a knight, was appointed gouernor to the yong king.

Which may not be excused, in saying that the same was then so done, because there wanted men of the kings blood to supplie those places. For at that time were living John Kennedie head of the familie, the kings kinsman by the sister of James the first; and the vncle by his fathers side: James Kennedie also, bishop of saint Andrews, a man of most account in the kingdome for all kinds of vertue, being borne of the kings aunt; and Douglas also, earle of Angus, with Archibald earle of Douglas, both of the kings blood; whereof the last was in riches and power almost equall to the king, but far beyond the wealth and power of all others; of whome, none did euer complaine to the parlement, when they were put besides the gouernement, and others not so nere of blood appointed therevnto. Not long after, foure tutors were appointed to James the third, which were not made in respect of blood; but chosen by the voices of the nobilitie.

And although of late, John duke of Albanie was by the nobilitie called out of France to the gouernment of Scotland, during the tender yeares of James the fifth, and confirmed in the same by publike decre of parlement; yet was it not giuen vnto him in respect of nearnesse of blood. For he had Alexander his elder brother in life, who although perhaps he was inferior to the duke; yet he was farre aboue James Hamilton (in all kind of vertue) which did sometimes reach after that place. But in the absence of James the first, Robert his vncle ruled the kingdome. But by what right? Was he admitted therevnto for nearnesse of blood? No fruit.

What then? Was he chosen of the people? No. How then was he made? Marie then king Robert the third was not sufficient to rule the kingdome, either for strength of bodie or mind, he did substitute Robert his brother as his deputie, & commended his children to his gouernment; who in the end famished David the eldest, and also threatened death vnto the yonger sonne James, which he did auoid by fleeing Scotland. Which Robert being in the possession of authoritie by tyrannie (and his brother killed with thought) did leaue the same to Murdac his sonne. So that it cannot be doubted what the mind of the last king Robert was to his brother, for he would neuer (if he had liued and bene in health) haue made him tutor of his children, whom at the houre of his death he cursed as the butcher of his children.

That time also, in which this Hamilton gouerned, doth remember vnto vs manie things (though what sooner was then done, is no proofe that it was well done) which are to be considered of. For when the cardinall Beaton did labor by subtiltie to inuade the chiefe gouernement, this Hamilton rather leaning to the hatred which good men did beare towards Beaton, than trusting to the fauor of the people towards himselfe, did leape into the empty place of a gouernor; in which he ruled with much crueltie and couetousnesse, and in few yeares after, both sold the gouernment (obtained by force) and the queene, whom he had vnder his authoritie. At what time was shewed the fauor which the people bare vnto him; when they preferred the gouernement of a strange woman, before the bondage which they had vnder him.

You see now (I hope) the request of the Hamiltons to be against our countrie lawes, and decrees of our ancestors, and that so contrarie vnto them, that wanting other sufficient arguments, he is constrained to confirme the same onelie with lies. But if there were anie such custome, I suppose there is none but doth see how vniust it were. For what can be more vnrighfull, than to commit yong, weak, and faultlesse yeares to his faith, which doth daile either looke or wish for the death of the pupil? Whole familie hath alwaies bene at daile and deadly warre with the house of the king that now is? 40 What defense can be here by nearnesse of blood against old malice, vnmeasurable couetousnesse, and the headie violence of (alreadie tasted) tyrannie? Laodice the queene of Cappadocia is supposed to haue killed hir owne children, as they came to yeares of discretion; and to haue bought the small continuance of hir gouernement with the blood of hir sonnes.

Wherefore, if the mother spated not hir owne flesh, for the gaine of short authoritie; what will old enemies do, inflamed to crueltie with the byands of couetousnesse (nay rather what is to be thought that they will not do) against a child, which desperately expect of their hope of gouernement? If this example seeme ouer old or obscure to anie man, or to be ouer farre set, I will lay downe some nearer home, and those most notable. Who is so ignorant of this late lie done, that he knoweth not that Caleas Sfortia (growne to discretion, a husband, and sonne in law to a most mightie king) was slaine by his vncle Lodowike? Or to whom are the calamities vnknowne, which followed so cruell a parricide and kin-slaier? For the most beautifull countrie of Italie was almost brought thereby to bitter destruction: the familie of the Sforties, the mother of manie a valiant person cleane destroyed, and the barbarous people (from whose crueltie and couetousnesse nothing was safe) brought into the pleasant places about Padua. Who is he that is borne in Britaine, that hath not heard of the crueltie of Richard (the third king of that name in England) against the children of his brother? But with what bloodshed was that in the end purged?

Now, list these did not feare to do such evils to their their nearest blood, by the onelie enforcing desire to gouerne, being otherwise tworthie persons: what shall we loke for from him, whose inconstancie of mind all the Scots doe knowe: whose vnskillfull gouernement they haue tried with manie slaughters: And (which is moze) whose familie not content with the murder of this kings great grandfather, did go about to intrap his grandfather by the mothers side, whilst he was in life; and when he could not kill the grandfather by the fathers side, he thrust the poore father out of the kingdome, brought forth the mother to be slaine as a sacrifice, & sold hir kingdome (when they could not inioy it) to strangers: out of which bondage she (by the prouidence of God) being deliuered, they haue throwne themselves into these troubles in which they now are. Whereby we may easilie vnderstand, what the iudgement of the common people was touching that matter, in that those men doe now seeme to be deliuered out of a prison of miserable bondage, and to behold the sweet light of libertie, when they (which knew not how to order it) did sell their gouernment to a strange woman.

These things being thus heard on both sides before the councell of England, the queene thereof by hir said councell declared to Hamilton, that he required an vnusuall thing, and that he should not hope for arie asd from hir; and that she hath promised the kings ambassadoe, that Hamilton should not depart England, before that the said ambassadoe had leaue likewise to go home. After that these things were done, and that the regent somewhat indifferentlie dispatched his affairs in England, he obtained leaue to depart, and was honozable conducted home with the English, who sufficientlie garded him: but especially the nobilitie and companie of the north parts; sith it was great honoz for hir maiestie safetie to returne him home, who (vpon hir letters had) was come out of his owne countrie. Which regent comming to Edinburgh the next day after the kalends of Februarie, hee was there receiued with great pompe.

Few daies after this, those of the kings faction assembled at Striueling, where the regent declared vnto them what he had done in England; which being well liked, was in the end confirmed by all the nobilitie. Much about that time, James Hamilton chiefe of that familie came out of England, being by the queene of Scots authorized with a new and arrogant letter: in that she called him hir father, and made him hir vicar and deputie of the kingdome. This man at his first comming made proclamation, that no man should obieie arie other than such as were substituted by him. Wherevpon those of the kings part (bestowing summes of monie vpon souldiers, to make them readie, if need required, to the vttermost confid) met on a day appointed at Glasgow.

But when there was a great assemblee of the common people at Hamilton, moze than they looked for, a meanes of agreement was attempted, with this condition: that Hamilton, comming to Glasgow, should acknowledge the king for chiefeest gouernor: which if he did, all other things should easilie be agreed; but if he denied that, he should come in vaine: all which he promised to doe, and the kings armie was dismissed. When he came to Glasgow, they obtained their former goods and honozs the same day, in which he and his friends professed themselves subiects to the king: but yet so, that in the meane time they should remaine in prison, or else giue pledges of their next kin; with further notice, that if arie of the said part would so doe, they should also be receiued on the same covenants, wherevnto the earle of Argile and the earle Huntlee refused to subscribe.

Hamilton comming at the day appointed to Edinburgh, did deferre the performance of his promises, deuising manie delaies; vntill the other principall of the factions were come, whereby the covenants might be established by all their consents, for which he prayed day till the tenth of Maie: and that in the meane time he might vnderstand the mind of the imprisoned queene of Scots: all which in the end was denied vnto him. Wherevpon Hamilton (confessing the truth) said, that he consented to those conditions by compulsion; and that (if he were free) hee would not allow of arie of them. For which answer, Hamilton & Harwell were committed prisoners to the castell of Edinburgh. The earle of Argile was suffered to be quiet at home, but the earle Huntlee was moze hardlie dealt withall, because that in the absence of the gouernor he had taken mante, and had made deputies about Crawford and Ogilvie.

Wherevpon there was day giuen vnto them both to meet at the assemblee at saint Andrews, whither the earle of Argile first came: with whom there was no extreme dealing, because he ceased to trouble the realme arie moze, was of kintred to the gouernor, and they two were of great friendship together euen from their yong yers. But when the cause of Huntlee (long before his comming) was well debated, the gouernor pronounced, that he would pardon all priuate faults done to him, or to the king: but that he neither could nor would pardon arie injuries done to any other. And if Huntlee, or his friends that followed his faction, could passe away with those spoils, he would willinglie labor that arbitratoes chosen by both parts, should temper the value of the damage. At that time also there grew a further mischief, whether all they which took part with Huntlee should also be pardoned; but in the end, vpon deliberation, all things seemed indifferentlie well pacified.

During these things, the queene of England sent letters into Scotland in the behalfe of the imprisoned queene, either that she might wholie be restored, or iointlie rule with hir sonne; or admitted to liue priuatlie in hir owne countrie. All which being denied to be granted, the Scots sent Robert Wethercarne, a man of great wisdom and fidelitie, to deliuer their answer vnto the queene of England. Whilst these things were in doing, the gouernor fearing the power of the imprisoned queene, which now waxed great, did call William Pettelan before him, from Perth to Striueling; who requested the earle of Argile to go with him for his better suertie. Afterwards, this William sitting in the councell, was accused by Thomas Crawford of the kings death, wherevpon he was commanded prisoner to a chamber in the castell, and others were sent to apprehend James Balfourie.

But in the end, the gouernors mildnesse suffered no great hurt to fall vpon them; for Balfourie by his friends some obtained pardon; and Pettelan being led to Edinburgh, was left in a house there not farre from the castell: to whome certaine horsemen were appointed keepers, vnder the charge of Alexander Hume a noble yong man, appointed chiefe over them. But William Bircadie, capteine of the castell of Edinburgh, about ten of the clocke at night, did counterfeit letters signed with the hand of the earle of Harreie, and brought them to Alexander, willing him to deliuer William Pettelan, which he did accordinglie. Wherevpon Pettelan was caried by Bircadie into the castell, to the great dislike of the nobilitie, being almost vncertaine whether they should impute the deed to Bircadie, or to the gouernor, not being vnacquainted with the boldnesse of Bircadie: in such sort, that the same was like to grow to a commotion, if the innocencie of the north of England, by the earles of Northumberland & westmerland.

In the yere 1569, the earles of Northumberland and Westmerland raised a rebellion against the quene's maiestie of England; but by the good diligence and prompt remedie of the earle of Suffolke, then lieutenant of the north parts, and by his direction as was giuen by his maiestie and his councell, for the leuering of an armie vnder the leading of the earle of Westmerland, and the lord admirall Clinton, the said two earles were kept so in feare, that they durst not aduance farre forward in their wicked begun enterprise, but were constrained to retire backe towards Durham. Whereupon the earle of Suffolke, supposing that their meaning was for their last refuge and safegard to take the castles of Alnwick and Warkeworth, he wrote vnto sir John Forster lord warden of the middle marches, either by force, policie, or some other means, to get into his hands the possession of those two castles, and the same to fortifie with such number and garisons of men, as to his discretion should be thought conueni-ent, for the safe custodie and gard thereof.

Sir John Forster, being at his house nere to Alnwick, when he receiued these letters, accompanied with his seruants, friends, and tenants, & some soldiers that were come to him from Berwicke, marched vnto the castell on foot, where finding the house garded with a great number of the earle of Northumberlands seruants, retainers, and tenants, he made proclamation before the castell gate, that e-uerie of them within the castell should come forth, and withdraw to their owne houses, vpon paine to be reputed rebels to the quene's maiestie: and that which of them sooner did refuse to obeie this proclamation, staying either in the castell or elsewhere in anie vniuersall assemblee, it should be lawfull for eueris man to spoile his goods, and him to kill if he made resistance.

This proclamation notwithstanding, they within the castell, at the first refused to yeld it vp. And thereupon sir John Forster marched through the towne into the market place, and there made the like proclamation in behalfe of all the inhabitants that were the earle of Northumberlands tenants, for their repairing home to their houses. And coming here with backe towards the castell, they within perceiving themselves destitute of succor, and sir John Forster to increase in power, did vpon better ad-uise yeld themselves vnto him, who saved all their liues. After the same manner he got also the castell of Warkeworth, and fortified them both with sufficient number of men. This done, he assembled such forces as he was able to make, so that he got together to the number of eleuen hundred horsemen, and tooke order to forsaie and stop the passages, so as the earles friends and tenants in Northumberland should not go vnto him.

After this, hauing in his companie the lord W-gle, and Thomas Forster his brother, and other gentlemen, he went to Berwicke, where with Thomas Gower esquire, that had the principall rule thereof at that time, he toke order for the defense of that towne against the rebels. Hither came to him sir Henrie Perrie, offering his seruice against his brother, and other the rebels, to the uttermost of his power. Hereupon diuerse excursions were made south of Berw-icke into the bishopricke, where the two earles were incamped, and sundrie skirmishes chanced betwixt the two parties, though no great hurt followed thereof. The earles yet on a day came from Durham, and with their armie marched towards Berwicke.
Sir John Forster, and sir Henrie Perrie, hauing intelligence thereof, fled south of Berwicke with all their forces, and certeine peces of great ordinance. They had also with them certeine bands of the soldiers of Berwicke, meaning thereto to haue joined battell with the earles: sir Henrie Perrie the which he thought as willing and forward thereto as any other in all the companies.

At Chester deane, midwaie betwixt Durham and Berwicke, the armies approached the one other to the other, a small brooke running in a hollow dis-tinging them asunder, so that there was no passage for them to conuene their ordinance ouer, the banks on either side being so deepe and cambered. Whereupon the earles, perceiving that they were disappointed of their purpose, after some skirmishes betwixt the horsemen, they returned vnto Durham: and from thence the next day they went to Berwicke, and after being in vtter despair, fled into Scotland: where the erle of Westmerland lighted among those that shifted him alwaie so from place to place, that he escaped out of that realme, when he could no longer remaine there in libertie. But the earle of Northumberland fell into their hands, which deliuered him vnto the regent, who thought he could do no lesse than put him in safe keeping, considering the amitie that was betwixt the two princes, the quene's mai-estie of England, and the king of Scots.

But shortly after, the regent (as he was riding through Alnwick) was wickedly shot in with an arquebuse, by one James Hamilton, and so wounded, that the next day he died of the hurt [as saith Buchanan out of a wood gallerie, in which were clothes hanged as it were to an other use.] * But the night before the slaughter of the regent, Walter Scot, and Thomas Bar also of Strathgill entered into England to spoile the borders, which they did more cruellie than euer was done before, rather for desire of reuenge of some iniurie, than for the gaine of anie booties. Besides which, the captiue of the castell where Perrellian was prisoner, was now commanded to set the same Perrellian at libertie: who vpon oath before the nobilitie (which allowed and confirmed the same) did purge himselfe of the death of the king, and of the ciuill warres moued in England (where with he was charged) adding that he would proue the same at anie time when day should be appointed to him therfore. After which, there was an assemblee made for the election of a new gouer-nour.

At that time Thomas Randolph, being sent thither ambassador for the quene of England in the life of the regent, had audience granted vnto him; whose message was, to demand the deliuerie of such rebels of England as had fled thither: which ambassador the deceased gouernour had before refused to heare at Strathgill. Whereupon, with all things were then in a turmoile by his death, they departed.
But now, when there was a parlement for the chosing of a new regent, Randolph which had bene in Scotland some yeres before, because he learned best to know the men and their conditions of Scotland, and because he had before dispatched some other ambassadors for the benefit of the realme, was held deere and well esteemed of the nobilitie, and therefore was brought into the councell.

Who, after that he had declared that the mind of his prince had bene vnto the Scots, he shewed that he would not now abbate the same vnto them in these troublesome times, no more than he had before done. After which he certaintized the inuasions made into England, with the slaughters, spoiles, and burnings committed a little before: all which he well knew was not done by the counsell or labor of the publike state: and therefore his quene's favor was not diminished to them, but that the same good will did remaine to them now, as ample as ever it was. And there she was grievously offended (and that without hir desert) yet she was not now determined (although by right the iustlie might) to demand publicke restitution and recompense for such enuill; nor to exact punishment of the whole nation for the widow-ing of a few.

For she was not ignorant what tumults and troubles of all things was of late raised amongst them. Notwithstanding this euill, she did not yet arise with doubt of the fauor of the good and vertuous men vnto hir: and that she would not onlie for their cause separate the offense from the publicke consent: but also (if they themselves for the domesticall seditions could not inforce the disturbers of the quiet to make restitution of such spoiles) that she would ioine hir power with them, to the end by common counsell they might take iust punishment vpon the truce-breakers. Which if they could not then do by that means, that yet she would prosecute those iniuries with hir owne people, whose armie should without any damage to them passe through such places as would be quiet, and take no reuenge vpon any that were not guiltie of that iniurie. The rest of the parts of his ambassage did containe admonitions alwaies profitable in all lawfull assemblies, but most necessarie for the present state of Scotland.

Whereof the first aduise was for the defense of religion, with an especiall care of diligence therein: sith the same alone doth teach vs the forme of our dutie, and peace towards God, our prince, our equal, & christian neighbors. For no common-wealth diuided in it selfe can long continue: for which cause they must chieflie labor with all their power, with might and maine, with saile and oars, that peace and quiet maie be holie and vertuouse nourished at home amongst their people. For sith God the creator of all things, hath imparted a kinglie gouernment ouer this nation, it is iust and meet that they obeye their princes; and in dutifull sort bestow all honor, reuerence, and obedience vpon them; sith peace, concord, amitie, and loue, with all men (as much as in vs lieth to vse) is most acceptable to God, and doth take awaie (or at the least hinder) the thirst and shedding of mens blood, a fault which God of all others doth most hate.

Which vnitie increasing the wealth of euerie one, maketh all nations more fearefull to their enemies, and is the preseruer of iustice: whose chiefe part consisteth in punishing the euill, is especiallie to be embraced: when contrarie dissention and treason is a thing most detestable to all lawfull gouernement: sith such kind of people are to be pursued with all extremite, and not be succored with any fauor, with any mercie, or with any pardon, into that countrie sooner they flee for refuge of their hated wickednesse. All these things did Randolph both godlie and wiselie admonish vs of, and iustlie and modestlie require from vs.

But because there was no regent chosen for the supreme gouernement, there could no certaine answer be giuen thereto: for which cause he was for that time put backe to the kalends of Maie. At last, William and James Dowieglas, brothers of the same regent by one mother, were heard in this parlement, who required that the vntoward death of their brother might be reuenged, sith the same was taken awaie not for any priuat grudge, but for the common-wealths cause. Upon the opening whereof men were of diuerse opinions about his death, though they all agreed that the offenders should be punished: for some would haue a day giuen to such as were suspected of the murder: for the names of manie persons were there shewed to answer the same. But it better pleased other not to wait for anie appointed day of law to be giuen to them, who had already taken armes with violence to defend that deed which they had already done; & that they should not onelie raise their weapons against them, but also against all such as were condemned in that assembly of the nobilitie.

To which opinion all the knights and souldiers did some agree, who yet could not hold their determination, especiallie sith the earle of Atholl and Morton did dissuade them from it: whereof the first would haue them tarrie, untill there were a greater assembly of the nobilitie: and the other supposed that it would come to passe; that if they ioined manie faults in one, that the reuenge of the regent would perish and come to nothing, and the matter would burst out to ciuill wars, thereby all they that feared peace, would flee to the part of such as were guiltie of the murder. Wherefore their faults were to be diuided, and (if it were possible) to treat of them by law, and that nothing should be done or changed untill the kalends of Maie, on which there was an assembly or parliament appointed.

Upon which persuation the companie was dissolved, though the greatest part of the nobilitie did condemn this delate, as moued thereto: because that the other would saie that all things were done at the becke of the kings enemies, who had thus protracted the time, to the end that the malice of the death of this regent might by little and little vanish in the meane time, and the aduerser faction gather greater power together. Which opinion of the common people was confirmed by manie things that went before, and manie things which followed. For presentlie (before the death of the regent was fullie spread abroad) James Hamilton (mortgaging his lands to John Summervill of Canineham) borrowed monie thereof: with which, and with other monie taken vp of the rest of his friends, he sent to his fauorers (to hire souldiers) being warned before, that they should alwaies be ready at all times, and for all causes which should happen by the taking awaie of their deadlie enemy, the earle of Arrerrie: neither after that time did the quenes factions cease from meeting in diuerse distant places.

On the fifteenth kalends of March, there did assemble the chiefe of the rebellious faction (for by that name and epitheton doth Buchanan alwaies terme those that took the quenes part) to deuise of their affaires. At what time the earle of Argile, and the lord Boyd did write vnto earle Morton, that they would willingly (sith they did not yet know who killed the regent, and who were consenting thereto) consult with the other nobilitie about the same matter, both to search out and to punish the same: and that they would not come to Edinburgh about that matter. But if the kings faction would be so perswaded, they would willingly come to Lifford, to Falkirk, or to Striueling, there to meet with them. Whereupon, the earle of Morton, consulting with Metellan about the same (for so it was desired in the letters) in the end it came to no effect. At the same time, Thomas Bar wrote to Lincolne (to vse Buchanans word) to the gardian of the castell, to see if he could obtaine of the quene of England to fraie hir armie: which if he brought to passe, that then he would take such order, that he would easilie pacifie the borders without any further trouble, and that they should remaine in that dutie which they were wont: but if he did refuse this condition, he would continue in his attempt, not doubting but the good subjects would shew their obedience towards their imprisoned quene, & would ioine themselves together, because aid would shortly come out of France vnto them.

On the first nones of March, the Hamiltons, the earle of Argyle, and Boid came to Lithquo; but the murder of one hired souldior did trouble all their de-uise by a sudden tumult that was raised thereupon. Wherefore the next day after the archbishop of saint Andrewes did bring the Hamiltons home, the rest of the quenes faction, especiallie the earles of Hunt-leie, Atholl, Crawford, and the lords Ogilvie, Hume, Seton, and Metellan, met at Edinburgh: in which the earle Porton was accompanied with a small traine, untill the earles of Glencarne and Spar were come with their retinue. The fourth nones of March the chiefe of the factions met togither to consult of the estate of things: but the same did proceed verie slowlie, by reason of the absence of the earle of Argile, whose power and authoritie was then verie great.

This man did Huntleie seeke to perswade to ioine with the rest of the faction, but he returned without doing anie thing (as it was supposed by most men) through the subtiltie of Metellan, which would haue things long deferred, that more conuenient meane might be had in that troublesome state of the kingdome, for the innouation of things. The greatest thing done in this assembling, was the argument for the chosse of a new gouernor, which (as it semeth) came to no effect. Now when all these assemblyes tended to little purpose, those of the quenes faction returned to soke sedition by procuring English warres, thereby to draw the common-people to assist their part. Wherefore they send the capteine (that before had done the like) afresh at this time to execute the same, who left nothing vndone that might tend to extreme crueltie.

During which, the heads of the faction do reproch the quene of England, and slander the nobilitie of Scotland, as though they were the clients and followers of the English; further threatening abroad in euerie place, that they would vse the aid of the French and Spanissh, if the lord of the congregation prayed in aid of the English. Much about that time, (as it were by chance) landed (out of France) at Dunbryeton, Meriacke, one of the chamber to the French king, which aduanced the mindes of the quenes faction, with manie large promises: by meanes whereof the Hamiltons appointed an assem-blye of their people at Lithquo the first ides of Aprill.

At which day, when a great assembly was made of the quenes faction, they began there openlie to treat of those things which before were whispered in secret: which was, that the death of the king and regent might be either forgotten, or at least war cold in the publike tumult of the realme, by making warre vpon the English. After which consultation, they determined to go to Edinburgh the third ides of Aprill, there (besides manie other commodities which might grow to them by that place) to ioine vnto them the citizens, by whom there was great helpe of good successe to be receiued. Which they thought they might easilie bring about, by reason that William Kirkcaldie was gouernor both of the castell and towne, against which deuise the citizens did yet contend. But in the end, with hard conditions, the quenes part was admitted into the towne. After which, not thus contented, they perswaded the citizens to deliuer by the keyes of their towne, which they most wiselie refused.

All this while there was a great resort to Metel-lan then lieng of the govt, for which cause his house was commonlie called the scholehouse, and himselte the scholemaister. In which meane time, the earle of Atholl did not spare to trauell hither and thither, to draw those of the other faction to that assembly at Edinburgh. But they would not come thither at all, untill the kalends of Maie (which was a day appointed for the parlement) vnlesse they knew some iust necessitie which might preuent that day: and then if there happened anie thing of moment, which might not suffer anie delaie, they would communicate the same to the earle Porton, whose house was but foure mile from thence, & he should giue other knowledges thereof. In the end, a day was appointed by the earle of Atholl, in which a few of both factions should meet at the towne of the earle Porton, called Dalkeith, which place did not like the quenes faction, whose strength was much holpen by such prisoners as Kircaldie had set at libertie out of the castell of Eden-burgh.

But all the deuises and helps of the quenes faction were quailed, by the rumoz of the English armie comming to Berwik. Whereupon, Alexander Hume, and John Partwell latelie deliuered out of prison, without anie publike authoritie, or leaue to set them free, went home to defend their owne possessions; and a portion of that monie, which they had gathered to hire souldiers, was giuen to the said lord Hume, to strengthen his castell of Hume. Thomas Bar, and Walter Scot (who were iudged to haue made some roads into England by the persuation of the bishop of saint Andrews, whereby wars should rise in England) being forsaken of those which inhabited nere these places, & fearing their owne estate, sent vnto the chiefe of the faction, requesting helpe of them: or if they would not do so, that at least they should come to Lowther the next towne; and from thence shew or make warre vpon England. Which when they could not obtaine (nor anie of the publike monie) they forthwith departed to their owne lands in great anger.

After this, whildest manie other things passed, as that the quenes faction sent an ambassado; to the earle of Suffex, to staie his tourne into Scotland; that they also sent letters to the quene of England concerning their cause; and that a seruant of monsieur Lausac in France, had brought letters to the quenes factions (with thanks for their fidelitie) directed also vnto other that were indifferent, to ioine with the imprisoned quene; and that he promised them aid out of France; and that the quenes people were assured, that the kings part would come to Edinburgh at the kalends of Maie: after all these things (I say) they of the quenes side departed to Lithquo, supposing that place most commodious to assemble their confederats. Whither when the Hamiltons and their clients were come, they beset all the way to Edinburgh: for when they vnderstood that John Areskin earle of Spar was comming thither, they laid ambushes vnder the next hills to intrap him.

But he knowing the insurie of the place, passed the riuer two miles aboue, and came to Edinburgh the third day of Maie about euening. Shortly after, the kings part remaining at Edinburgh, and the quens at Lithquo, the three earls, Arran, Argile, and Huntleie appoint a parlement at Lithquo, the three nones of August. The other faction sent Robert Betscarne ambassado; to the quene of England, to intreat with hir about the suppression of the common enemie; and further to let hir vnderstand, that such were the good minds of the Scots vnto hir, that they would chosse a regent by hir appointment.

Besides which, the said lords of the kings part with generall consent wrote letters vnto the erle of Lennox, then remaining in England, to repaire home with all conuenient sped into Scotland. & We make read in the historie of England, in what sort the erle of Suffex lord lieutenant of the north parts, entring into Lincolne the seuen & twentieth of Aprill, burnt the Do. ff. the

the Holve tower, the towne of Cratwling, the castell of Fernherst, the towne of Hovvike, and the castell of Baurton, that belonged to the laird of Buckelwgh, with diuerse other castels, piles, towne, villages, and hamlets belonging to the lairds of Fernherst, Buckelwgh, and others in those parts: also how the lord Scrope invaded the west borders of Scotland at the same time: and likewise how the said earle of Dunbar won the castell of Hume, with diuerse other matters which here I passe over, referring you to the said historie.

But now about the same time, the earle of Lennor, having got licence of the queene of England to make his returne into Scotland, was set forward, and came to Berwike towards the latter end of Aprill, where being visited with sicknesse, he remained by the space of fourtene daies or more. In the meane time the duke of Chatelerault, the earles of Huntley, and Cassils, the lord Fleming, and sundrie others of that faction, seeing the time served well for their purpose, now that the regent was sicke and dispatched out of the waite, gathered a power, to the number of thre thousand men, and came downe to Edinburgh. But after that they had knowledge that the erle of Lennor was coming out of England with a power of Englishmen, by the queens maiesties appointment; aswell for the safeguard of the yong king, as also for the safe conduct of the earle of Lennor home into Scotland: the duke and earles aforesaid retired themselves from Edinburgh to Glascow, where they besieged the castell by the space of five or six daies, untill the earle of Lennor approached thitherwards. For ye have to understand, that after the earle of Lennor was recovered of his sicknesse, there was appointed a power of horsemen and footmen, to go with him into Scotland, vnder the leading of sir William Durié; as in the English storie ye may read more at large.

There were diuerse valiant capteins and gentlemen that went with him in that tourne, aswell such as had charge, as those that went with him of their owne god wils, to see the order of things, and to helpe to aduance their princes seruice. With charge there were these; sir George Carie capteine of an hundred lances, Henrie Austell capteine of fiftie lances, William Curleie capteine of fiftie lances, maister Henrie Carie capteine of two hundred light horsemen, capteine Case lieutenant of the generals band of light horsemen, being also two hundred: sir Robert Constable sergeant maior of the footbands, sir Thomas Haners, capteine Birkwell, capteine Caruill, capteine Game, capteine Lambard, capteine Crington, John Constable, and Humfreie Berwike leaders of the footmen. Capteins Crington was also lieutenant to sir George Caries companie of lances. Other gentlemen that went of their owne god wils, there were diuers; as maister George Denercur, sir Jerome Bowes, maister William Knolles, maister Robert Knolles, maister Michaell Carie, maister Gawdie, maister William Durié of Suffolke cousin to the generall, maister Grenill, brother to sir Fulke Grenill, maister Conweie, brother to sir John Conweie, maister Edmund Nerneie, and manie others, whose names I could not learne.

The footmen laie the first night at Coldingham. The next day the earle of Lennor himselfe with sir William Durié and the horsemen overtook the footmen, and lodged that night at Dunbar. The next day they made such speed in their march, that they came through to Edinburgh, where they found the earles of Morison, Durreie, Glenearne, the lords Ruthwen, Lindsete, Sempill, Glamis, Methuen, Ogiltrie, and Cathcart, with diuerse gentlemen of the kings side; who received the said earle of Lennor, and the Englishmen verie courteously. From Edinburgh they passed to Lithquho, as in the English historie it maie appeare: and from thence the footmen passed to Fankirke, and there lodged. But the earle of Lennor, and the Scottish lords, with sir William Durié and the horsemen rode to Sterling, where the king laie, then being in the custodie of the earle of Mar. From thence they went to Glascow, where the duke had besieged the castell, which was valiantlie defended by the lord of Spinto and his brethren, with their seruants, being not past eightene persons in all; and yet they kept it five or six daies against the duke and his whole power, staling (as hath bene reported) about fortie or fiftie of his men; but in the end they were in great danger to haue bene taken, if they had not bene the more speedilie relieved. But the duke and his adherents, vnderstanding of the coming forward of the erle of Lennor with the English forces, brake vp his siege and fled awate, with losse and dishonor, as in the English historie we haue likewise noted.

After that the earle of Lennor and his friends were thus come vnto Glascow, finding the siege raised, he remained there by the space of five or six daies. During which time, there came to him of his kinned and friends, which owght him their seruice, according to the vse of the countrie, the number of foure thousand men, verie well appointed after their maner; the more part out of the countries of Lennor and Darneleie, which mustered before the said earle, and sir William Durié, generall of the English there. This done, the earle of Lennor, accompanied with the earles and lords before mentioned, & likewise with the Englishmen, marched to Hamilton, where they entred into the palace belonging to the duke, and lodged therein that night.

The next day they besieged the castell, whereof Andrew Hamilton of Perinton was capteine, having vnder him fiftie souldiers to defend it; and would not therefore deliuer it, till that two peces of great ordinance being brought from Sterling, were planned in batterie. For then perceiving themselves in danger to be taken by force, the capteine offered to yeld the house to the Englishmen; but not to the lords of Scotland, with condition, to haue the liues of all them within saued. Which was granted, vpon promise, that they should neuer after beare arms against their king, and to depart the realme within a certaine terme, and herevnto they were sworn. But they kept not long their oth, for the night next ensuing, they did beset the lord Sempill that was lodged at that present in a house not far off, and not able to keepe it till rescue came, yelded it and himselfe prisoner, so that he was kept by the Hamiltons in safe custodie by the space of twelue moneths after. The castell of Hamilton being yelded (as ye haue heard) was blowen vp with powder. Diuers other houses there in the countrie about were burnt also, as Kiplocke, the abbat of Kilwinnings house, with diuerse other of the Hamiltons houses in Clid-desdale.

After the castell of Hamilton was thus toone and ouerthrowen, the lords returned to the palace, and lodged there againe that night; and on the morrow, they set fire both vpon the same palace, and also vpon the towne of Hamilton: and therewith the Englishmen taking leaue of the lords in Scotland, departed homewards; as in the English historie ye may reade more at large. The erle of Morison went with them; but the earle of Lennor and the other earles and lords with their companies toke their way towards Glascow, and from thence euerie of the the noble men departed home to their houses. Shortly after, there was a convention of the lords at Striueling, where the earle of Lennox was made lord lieutenant of Scotland: and afterwards in August following, there was an other convention at Edinburgh, where, by the consent of the three estates of the realme, the said earle was made regent of Scotland.

And about the same time, the earle of Huntlie took upon him to be lieutenant of Scotland for the queene of Scots that remained still in England, and thereupon in his name summoned a parlement to be holden at Litchburgh the one and twentieth of September then next following. Unto the which parlement, aswell the earle of Lennox then regent, as all the residue of the lords of both parties were summoned. Whereof the regent being advertised, caused a parlement to be summoned in the kings name to be kept at Litchburgh, at the selfe same day which was appointed by the earle Huntlie. At which day there appeared the lords of the kings partie, & also sundrie great lards, knights, and gentlemen, to the number of eight thousand, verie well furnished, looking for the earle of Huntlies comming, according to his appointed order; but he came no nêrer than Brechine.

Whereupon it was decreed by the regent and nobilitie there, to pursue him: and to that end, James Douglas earle of Morton was sent before with a thousand horsemen to have taken him upon the sudden in the towne of Brechine, before he should have any warning of their comming, the regent following after with an armie. But Huntlie having warning of their approach, escaped their hands, although verie narrowlie; in somuch that some of his followers were so put to their shifts, that they were driven for their refuge (being so beset on the sudden) to take the castell of Brechine: the earle of Huntlie promising before he went from them, to succour them within eight daies; but they being freilie besieged, and the earle not keeping promise with them, after those eight daies were expired, they yielded themselves and the castell unto the regents mercie.

They were in all about three hundred, of which number one and thirtie of the chiefest were executed. Some of them had borne arms against the king before that time, and had bene pardoned, and therefore were now thought by the regent and his friends the more worthy to die. After this, the regent returned to Striueling, and from thence passed to the castell of Downe, and besieged it; being kept by the servants of the lord of saint Colmes Inch, who yielded it to the regent after three daies siege. During the time of the regents being there, he sent one of his servants called John Dhone, with letters into England, directed to the queene of Englands counsell: who (for his secret practising and conference had with such as were enemies to the king and regent before his departure out of Scotland, and for receiving of their letters to be conveyed also, and hereunto with discovering sundrie secrets to them, the which were committed unto his credit and trust) was apprehended, and the same letters which he had secretly received being found upon him, and the matters aforesaid proved against him, he was by law executed.

About the same time the earle of Morton, the abbat of Dunfermeling, and James Macgill, cleark of the register, were sent into England commissioners upon the kings partie; the bishop of Ross, the abbat of Kilwinning, & the lord Levingston, appointed for the queene then being in England. In January following, the regent then being at Edinburgh, Claud Hamilton, one of the duke of Chateleraunts sonnes, entered the house of Dasselie, then being kept by the servants of the lord Darnley: and seizing upon all things which they found as good with his pleasure, he fortified the house with munition, and vittels, such as he could get either in the towne of Dasselie, or nere thereabouts. The regent advertised thereof, repaired thither with a power in all speedie wise, and laid siege to the house. They within sued for a truce, which was granted to them for the space of six daies, the better to advise of their owne estate: which terme being expired, proclamation was made by the regent, that if they would yield the house, so manie of them as had not borne arms before that time against the king and regent, should have their lives saved, the rest to remaine at the regents pleasure.

Whereupon contention rose among them within the house: for whereas the more part of them having not served in any iournie or exploit against the king before that time, would needs yield; the other, being the lesse number, were not able to defend it of themselves. Whereupon they were readie to draw their weapons one against another; but yet in the end they agreed to surrender the house, and yielded themselves, upon such condition as the regent had prescribed: whereupon five of them were executed, & all the rest were pardoned of their lives. The capitaine John Hamilton, lard of Coughnall, and his two brethren excepted, who were sent to the castell of Glasgow, there to remaine in prison, and shortly after the said John Hamilton was executed.

In March following, the regent returned to Glasgowe, and for that Gilbert Kennedy with the erles of Cassilis & Eglinton refused to shew themselves obedient to the king, and would not come to the regent, who had sent for them by letters at sundrie times, the regent gathered his power at Glasgowe, and with the same marched towards Arbrin and Air, and so forward to the earle of Cassilis countrie, who hearing of the regents comming, sent forth his brother to offer his submission. Whereupon it was concluded, that the messenger should remaine with the regent as pledge for his brother, by the space of thentie daies; and then the said earle to make his appearance before the regent at Striueling, to answer such matters as should be laid to his charge.

The same time also Hugh Montgomerie earle of Eglinton, and Robert Boyd leuied their bands also to appeare and answer in like sort: and as well the one as the other (according to their assurance given) appeared at the day appointed; but yet not agreeing to such articles as were required of them, they were both committed to prison, the one in the castell of Dunbarton, & the other in the castell of Downe. Afterwards there was a truce taken betwene the regent, the Hamiltons, and their adherents for thentie daies, to wit, untill the last of March. Which truce once ended, the regent determined with himselfe to give an attempt to the castell of Dunbarton, which had bene long kept by the lord Fleming against the king, and the earle of Murray late regent, who had besieged it for the space of halfe a yere or more, but could not by any meanes compasse to win it.

But now on the first of Aprill, the truce being then expired, the regent going forward with his purpose, caused all the passages round about the countrie to be stopped, as well by land as by water; and the same night sent thitherward capitaine Thomas Crawford, and capitaine Hume, with an hundred souldiers, chosen out for the purpose: who the second of Aprill, about foure of the clocke in the morning, came to the castell, where the souldiers with ladders, ropes, and other devices, found meanes to cline by the rocke, which is of an exceeding great heighth, and so with great paine, and moze danger, at length got vp to the wall of the castell, standing vpon the heighth of the rocke, to the which wall they reared vp a ladder, by the which entered first one Alexander Hamlie, ensigne-bearer to capteine Crawford, & leaping ouer the wall, was streightwaies assailed by thre of the watchmen, of the which he slue one: and a souldier named Wederborne that followed him, being the second that entered, slue another of them: the third of those watchmen was also slaine, as he was about to flee from them.

Herewith captaine Crawford & captaine Hume got ouer the wall, and entering the castell with the rest of their souldiers, stroke vp the drum, & cried: A Derneleie, being their watchword; and seizing vpon the ordinance, manned the same. The lord Fleming captaine of the castell, hearing that sudden fright and tumult within the house, fled out by the posterne gate at the neither baile, and so escaping, got a fishers boat, and passed into Argyle. The souldiers of the castell, perceiving their captein fled, and the castell possessed by the enemies, yielded themselves, and were pardoned. There were taken within the castell John Hamilton, the archbishop of saint Andrews, monsieur de Meriacke a Frenchman, sent thither by the French king, also the ladie Fleming, wife to the lord Fleming, and John Fleming lord of Boghall, Alexander the sonne of William Leuingston, and John Hall an Englishman, being partener of a new intended conspiracie, as was after proued against him, for the which he was arreigned, condemned, and executed at London; as in the English historie appeareth.

The third of Aprill, being the morrow after that Dunbryeton was thus strangely toone, the regent came thither, and entered the same, where he calling the captains and souldiers together, caused them with him to kneele downe vpon their knees, and to giue God humble thanks for their good successe in that enterprize, brought to passe rather by the providence of God than otherwise, sith the castell seemed to all those that knew it, impossible in manner to be toone, by reason of the great heighth of the rocke, and the strange situation, being incircled almost round about with the water of Clide on the one side, and the water of Leuin on the other. The report of the winning of this castell was sofull to the townes and countries about, which before had bene a continuall scourge to them, by reason that the souldiers that kept it, would issue out at sundrie times, robbing, spoiling, and carieng alwaie the commodities of the inhabitants thereabouts, as well by land as by water.

The regent dealt verie honorable with the ladie Fleming, suffering hir to depart alway with all such plate and iewels, as appertained either to hir or hir husband. He granted also a safe conduct to monsieur de Meriacke, to passe homewards through the countrie, but the archbishop of saint Andrews was sent prisoner to Striueling. The spoile of the goods found in the castell was giuen to the souldiers that ventured so dangerouslie to atchieue so high an enterprize, bringing it to the wished effect by pollicie with so little bloodshed as deserueth perpetuall remembrance. The day next insuing, being the fourth of Aprill, the regent appointed John Cunningham lord of Dunmehall, a man of good seruice, and seruant to the regent, to be captaine of that castell, and leaning him therein, departed to Striueling, where he caused the archbishop of saint Andrews to be examined vpon certeine articles, as well touching the murder of the late king Henrie, as also for the death of the earle of Murreie the late regent.

At that time there came in a priest without compulsion of anie (as hath bene said) and before the regent declared, that one John Hamilton, being in extreme sicknesse, vnder confession told him, that the bishop did send him with thre others to the murder of the king. And as touching the murder of the erle of Murreie, the bishops flat answer was, he might haue letted it if he would. Therewith the people that heard him, cried, Awaie with him, hang him. And so for these and other offenses, for the which he had bene forsalted afore that time, he was now executed on a gibet, set vp in the market place of Striueling towne. After this, the regent summoned a parlement, to begin at Edinburgh the fourteenth of Maie next insuing, and passed from Striueling to Lithqno.

Here the earle of Morison (with the rest of the commissioners for the kings part, being returned out of England, with other of the nobilitie) met the regent, and then they passed toward Edinburgh, where they thought to haue bene receiued, and so to haue kept the parlement there. But they were not suffered to enter that towne, nor yet the castell, the same being defended against them by the lord of Grange, who after the death of the earle of Murreie, was revolted from the kings part to the Hamiltons side, and had fortified both the towne and castell: so that the regent and nobilitie being kept out there, held their parlement in the Cannogate street, within the suburbs of the towne, where sundrie of the quenes part were forsalted. This being done, and sundrie skirmishes had with them that issued forth of the towne against them without, the regent returned to Striueling, there to remaine for a season.

In the meane time the earle of Morison, hauing certeine stiffe come forth of England by sea, and brought to land at Leith, sent the lord of Carmichell with his household seruants, & two hundred shot, to fetch the same from thence vnto Dalkeith, being five miles distant from Leith. At their returne with the stiffe, they were set vpon by the earle of Huntleie, and the lord Hume, who issued out of Edinburgh with their powder: so that betwixt them was a verie hot skirmish. But in the end the earle of Huntleie, & the lord Hume were constrained to flee, and were pursued by Carmichell and his companie euen vnto the gates of Edinburgh, some of their men being slaine, and others taken prisoners. For reuenge of which ouerthrow, shortly after the earle of Huntleie, and Claud Hamilton, with their forces marched from Edinburgh, to Dalkeith, purposing to haue spoiled the towne.

But the earle of Morison, hauing knowledge of their intention and coming, sallied forth of Dalkeith with the power which he had there with him, although not comparable in number to his aduersaries; & meeting them in the field, there was a sharpe skirmish betwixt them, and manie hurt on both parties: but in the end the earle of Morison was put to the worse, fourtie or moze of his men taken prisoners. And the cause was, for that his footmen were too forward, wanting helpe of their horsemen that should haue succoured them. About the five & twen-tith day of Maie following, captaine Cullen issued forth of Edinburgh with two hundred shot, meaning to intercept certeine harquebusers, which were appointed to come out of Fife ouer the riuer of the Forth, vnto the earle of Morison, who kept still at Dalkeith.

Wherevpon the said earle, hauing knowledge of Cullens enterprize, advertised the regent thereof, who being then at Striueling, the next day came downe to Dunfermling in Fife. But before his coming thither, thither, Cullen had met with a bote upon the water, wherein were aboard five and twenty shot, whome he took prisoners, and led them awaie with him to Edinburgh. The next day the earle of Morton came to Leith, where he met with sir William Dornie, and there they lodged that night. The next morning sir William Dornie passing forth of Leith towards Edinburgh, accompanied with sundrie captives, and other gentlemen for his comraie thither, they within Edinburgh perceiving them coming, imagined that they were come forth to offer a skirmish, whereupon they issued out of the towne and called to encounter them.

So that being ready on either side to begin the skirmish, sir William Dornie, being come to talke with the parties for some accord to be had, took in hand with great diligence to appease them: and at length procured them to agree upon a truce to endure till eight of the clocke at night. But yet then both parts staid in the fields for the space of an houre, because they could not agree whether captives should first retire from the field, they fell at length in skirmish (notwithstanding the truce) and fought verie sharpe for the time, till in the end they of the towne and castell had the overthrow: the abbatt of Kilwinning being slaine, with diuerse other, and there were taken about an hundred prisoners: amongst the which the lord Hume, and capteine Cullen were accounted principall. Those that escaped were chased, & constrained for their safetie to flee into the towne of Edinburgh, & capteine Cullen was afterwards beheaded.

The regent immediately after this skirmish came with all speed to Leith, as well to fortifie the towne, as to make some further attempt against his adversaries within the towne and castell of Edinburgh. Whereupon was Leith (whose capteine was Patrick Lindseie) intrenched round about, being esteemed a place of great importance, standing both in the face of the enemies, and so ready to annoy them, and also serving well to prevent them of such succour as they looked for daillie out of France. In this meane time, the lord of Grange, then capteine of the castell, and prouost of the towne of Edinburgh, caused proclamation to be made, that all those inhabitants which were not willing to take part with him in his doings, should depart out of the towne. Whereupon, manie of them departed thence, together with their wiues and children, and took with them also such goods as they could secretly conueie: and coming to Leith, offered their service vnto the regent, who thankfullie accepted their offer: and so they remained at Leith, serving against the contrarie faction vpon their owne expences.

After this, the lord of Grange, vnderstanding that report had bene made by some of the kings part, that he was a traitor to the king, and an enemy to his countrie, offered the combat to anie that would fight the same. Which being advertised to them within Leith, diuerse gentlemen were desirous to undertake the challenge: but the regent granted it to the lord of Carlisch, being a Steward, & his kinsman, who had earnestlie requested it. Whereupon, after diuerse messages by heralds sent to and fro betwixt them, the time and place was appointed; but the matter went not forward, excuse being made on the behalfe of the lord of Grange, that by reason of the charge which was committed to him, it was not thought convenient that he should hazard the whole cause vpon his owne person.

Shortly after, there came out of France one John Cheselholme, who was sent with monie to the lord of Grange for the payment of his souldiours: he brought with him also a certeine quantitie of powder, and some hundred caluises. Upon his entering into the towne of Strueling, and coming by the same, he learned how the regent was in Leith: whereupon he landed at Besset Island, and after wards for feare his himselfe betwixt two cliffs of a roche, not farre from the quaines ferrie: but at length he was found out by the abbatt of saint Colmes Inch, and deliuered to the regent at Leith, in which towne the said regent was about two moneths, being sundrie meanes, as well by pacifick and policie, as by force to haue taken the towne of Edinburgh. In the meane time sundrie skirmishes chanced betwixt them, and diuerse prisoners were taken on either part.

At length, the regent caused a parliament to be summoned, appointing the same to be holden at Strueling the two & twentieth of August next ensuing. And when that day approached, he left the lord Lindseie at Leith in charge, as his lieutenant to gouerne the towne, and all the men of warre appointed to remaine in gard thereof; and repaired himselfe to Strueling, where at the prefixed date was assemble the earles of Morton, Mar, Crawford, Sutherland, Spontrosse, Glenton, Glencarne, the lords Hume, Wemyss, Glamis, Methuen, Semple, Ogilvie, and Cathcart, with manie lords and gentlemen. The first day of this parliament the king was conueied thither, the crowne, scepter, and sword being borne before him.

When he had taken his place, he uttered a certeine speech as had bene taught him, touching the assembling of that parliament, which matter the regent more at large declared vnto the whole house: and this done, they proceeded further to other affaires, concerning the state of the common-wealth. Whereafter in this parliament, the duke of Chateaufort with his two sonnes, the abbatt of Arbroth, and Claud Hamilton, the earle of Hunslet, the lord of Grange and sundrie others were forsailed. This parliament continued by the space of seven daies: at the end wherof, to wit, vpon the second of September, Claud Hamilton, the lord of Bouclugh, the lord of Dumfries, and diuerse others, to the number of three hundred horsemen, verie earlie in the morning entered the towne of Strueling, and suddenly beset not onely the regent, but also the rest of the nobilitie within their lodgings.

The regent hearing a great uprore raised within the towne (in which George Keith was slaine) and not vnderstanding the cause, nor who were the authors thereof, after he perceived how the house wherein he lodged was beset on eche side, he defended the same against the enemies for a good space: but at length despairing of succours, and doubting least the house had bene underlaide with some barrells of powder, and that it would be blowne vp if he yielded not as some told him: and the enemy to increase that doubt, crying still, Blow vp the house, what should he stand longer about him: at length he was contented to yield to the lord of Dumfries, but not before he saw that some of his stoutest captiues had yielded themselves before his face. He yielded, with condition to haue his life saved: but promise in that behalfe was not long kept. For those that had thus taken him, when they perceived rescue coming downe from the castell, so that they should not be able to carrie him awaie, capteine Cander with a pistolet shot him into the bodie, before he could be recovered out of their hands.

The rest of the nobilitie, to wit, the earles of Morton, Glenton, and Glencarne, and diuerse other being taken prisoners, were presently rescued by those that issued out of the castell. The earle of Morton being in the hands of the lord of Bouclugh, took the same lord prisoner, he yielding himselfe vnto him: and and likewise the earle of Glencaine took his proper prisoner, and so did sundrie others take their authors: but Claude Hamilton, with others their companies, having first gotten all the horses that were found in the towne into their hands, when they heard that the rescue was coming, shifted for themselves, and fled away. The regent, being mortallie wounded, but yet delivered from his enemies, rid by to the castell, and calling there unto him the whole nobilitie, when he perceiued his end to approach, he used these words (or the like in substance) as followeth.

The earle of Lennor his words before his death.

My lords, it is not unknowne unto you all, that my coming hither to take this regiment vpon me, was not of mine owne seeking, but at the request of you all. And that which chiefly moued me hereunto, was for the defense of the kings person, being yet (as you see) an infant; of whom by nature and dutie I was bounden to haue carefull consideration, and that in his minoritye, the good and quiet gouernement of this common-wealth might be aduanced, and iustice executed vpon those that most cruelly did murder the late king, my sonne the kings father, and his uncle the good earle of Murray, late regent: whose mischeuous and diuelish deuises if in time you do not prevent by your wisdoms and discretions, they will procure the small overthrow and destruction of you all. In this action (as you see) I haue spent my blood, and haue played the last part of my tragedie, and now I seele death to draw nere at hand.

Wherefore I require you all, for the due regard that you haue of your duties, first to almighty God, and next to the king your most lawfull and naturall prince now in these his tender yeeres, wholly to imploye your seruice in his defense, with care to mainteine the state of this common-wealth, whereby you shall not onely accomplish your duties towards God, but shall be assured to find in your king in time to come (God lending him life) all that good which you can lawfully require. And I shall further commit to your friendly protection, my poore seruants, who for their good seruice haue well deserved, and yet remaine unrecompensed, desiring you all to be good to them. And lastly, I desire you to commend me vnto charitable prayer for my deere wife, now being in England: vnto whom I beseech God to be a comfort. And now sith my spirits begin to faile, and that my life draweth nere to an end, I take my leave of you all, desiring you to pray to God for me: These words being ended, he called to God for mercie, and continuing in prayer vnto the end, with in a while after he departed this life, and was buried in the kings chappell in the castell of Striueling.

The earle of Lennor departed this life.

Thus haue I hitherto continued this historie of Scotland; not so largelie nor perfectlie as I could haue wished, but skambled forward with it in such sort as you maie see; hauing deliuered nothing vnto you to impaire the credit of the Scottish nation, or otherwise than I haue found in authoers, or learned by credible report (as I take it) hauing put off the parciall affection, which I beare of dutie to mine owne countrie, in this respect, that I should not seeme to twist the words of writers, either to the aduantage of the English people, or disadvantage of the Scots, speciallie in politike gouernement, warlike exploits, ciuill demeanour, and other vertuous exercises: which as I haue found them either in arie one person particularlie, or in the multitude in generall; so haue I reported the same, not sparing the truth herein, as I haue found it recorded, either for loue or hatred, dread, fauor, or enuie: but yet in no wise presuming (as else where I haue said) to vse mine owne censure, but rather leauing the iudgement of other mens reports vnto the readers discretion. To whom I wish such vnderstanding and knowledge in the truth, as maie satisfie himselfe, and rebound to the publike commoditie of his countrie, and pleasure of the almighty; in whose hands are the hearts of kings & gouernours, guiding the states of realms and common wealths, as to his diuine wisdom seemeth most expedient. To whom be glorie, honor, and praise for evermore, Amen.

Thus farre the painefull industrie of Raphaell Hollinshead, and others.

The sequelle, concerning the continuation of this Scottish historie, is a new addition before this time neuer in English published.

THE ANNALES OF

Scotland in some part continued from the time in which Holinshed left, called Thin.

Socrates (good reader) being demanded how a man might speake that which should be best and acceptable to all men, most wiselie (as one in all his life wholie giuen to serch and saie the truth in euerie thing) answered: That we then speake best & most to be allowed, when we speake nothing but that which we best and perfectlie know. For we know nothing excellentlie well, but such things as are often heard by vs from others, manie times repeated by our selues; and that which is commonlie receiued, imbraced, approoted, and vsed by all men. Now those things are most vsed which concern publicke affaires, and such publicke affaires are most knowne when they end in publicke action; & publicke action, so farre forth as it concerneth the thing doone, must needs be true that the same was so doone in that order, as it was openlie seene to be doone. Whereby might be concluded, that in chonicling and treating of publicke affaires, we should speake that which is best, which is most acceptable, & most true: because we report things doone in the eies of all men. But how trulie that is performed in some new writers, it is well knowne to all men of iudgement.

For such is the affection of our age, that some of malice, and some for flatterie, and euerie one to feed their owne disposition, doo so glose things publiklie doone, as with a certeine witcherie of words, they like Circes transforme the things doone in publicke shew to be of other shapes than they were indeed. Whereby Socrates maie now seeme to be confuted, in saing, that they speake best that speake things receiued of all men, and that be common to the world: for so shall misreporting and flatterie, a thing commonlie knowne and vsed of all men, be the best speech; which in truth neither is nor can be. Now what I haue seene and knowne in that, as well of things at home as of things abroad, I forbore to write; and for that cause also might most iustlie restraine my pen (writing vpon the report of others) both now and hereafter from treating of such publicke affaires, to the end my selfe should not run into the danger of a like falsifier or misreporter. But then on the contrarie part, when I fall to an other exposition of the same saleng of Socrates, that he speaketh best, that speaketh that which he best knoweth, and that we best know the things which are commonlie receiued, and that we receiue those for soundest which time trieth to be most true, and those things which be most true are such as are knowne to be publikelie doone; I suppose I shall speake best and most acceptable in writing publicke affaires; considering that I am not sworne to anie faction, nor carried with hate or loue, nor bewitthed with promise of gaine or honour, nor inforced to turne to the right or left hand, but onelie left at libertie to make truth the daughter of time to be the common end, knowledge, and report of publicke things; sith the end of labor, of contemplation of studie, & fruit of writing (as appeareth 2. Met. 4.) is the attaining of truth, and not that perpetuallie or memorie of a famous name or report, a thing alwaies sought by me to be auoided, being onlie content in secrecie to relie my selfe vpon the recording of truth, which of all things (in my mind) is most pleasant, because the same is alwaie a conqueror. For as saith Nehemias, Truth is great and dooth mightilie preuaile. Wherefore, as I said, sith those things be most true & best knowne which are publikelie doone, and that they are publikelie doone that sort to anie action in the common-wealth: we then conclude that we write best and most acceptable, when we trulie set downe a common truth of common occurrents doone in the common-wealth; because that such things trulie reported, doo conclude with Socrates that we speake and write best in declaring a deed trulie doone, in that order (without ambages, gloses, or parcialities) as the same was most trulie performed touching the truth of that outward act.

Accept therefore (good reader) that which I doo suppose I haue best spoken (by this my argument grounded vpon Socrates) in this my continuance of the Annales of Scotland vnwillinglie attempted, but by inforcement of others, whose commanding friendship it had bene sacrilege for me to haue gainesaid. And therefore rather carelessse to hazard the hard opinion of others, descending vpon my sudden leaping into the printers shop (especially at the first in a matter of such importance) than the losse of the long and assured friendship of those which laied this heauie charge vpon my weake shoulders, I haue like blind baiard boldlie run into this matter, vnder the hope of thy fauourable acceptance. And though herein I shall not in euerie respect satisfie all mens minds and iudgements, that for fauour of persons, times, & actions, will like Proteus at their owne pleasure make black seeme white, alter euerie matter into euerie shape, & curiously carping at my barrennes in writing, because I omit manie things in this my continuance of the Annales of Scotland. Be haie reported things in other formes than some mens humors would haue had me to doo. I must desire thee to consider for the first that the Scots themselves, besides manie others of our owne nation are the cause thereof, who either for feare durst not, or for pretended aduile and consultation in the matter would not, or for the restraint of others might not, impart to me such things as should both concerne the honour of the Scottish nation, and the substance of their owne cause. For the other matter, if I should bind my stile to the affections of some, I should breake the rule of Socrates, and not speake the best, sith I should then speake publicke and common things, publikelie knowne to all men, contrarie to that order, in which they were commonlie and publikelie seene to be doone of all men; and so by that meanes fall into the reproch of a disdeined reporter.

Now, if thou which art the reader, thinke that I (vnacquainted with matters of state, especiallie in an other countrie, better knowne to all men than to my selfe) am far vnable to breake the dangerous ice of such matters, and so more vnmeet to enter into the bosome of princes (whose hart as Salomon saith are vnsearchable) should for my vnadvisednesse seeme worthie the punishment of Prometheus, that stole the fier from Iupiter, and caried it abrode into the world, because the affaires of princes are not to be made common, to be submitted to the censure of their subiects, nor to be written vntill the ashes of all those whome the things concerne were vtterlie consumed: thou must yet remember that men haue escaped punishment in dealing with higher matters than with things of chronicles, or of such like which onelie touch the life of the bodie. And therefore in punishing thereof vpon Prometheus, Iupiter went beyond himselfe. For if the greater, that is for matters touching the soule, went not onelie free from punishment, but receiued eternall reward, as after shall appeare, how much more should Prometheus haue bene spared, that but onelie medled with the bodie? Now it is manifest that in diuinitie and matters of the soule (a thing that so far exceedeth the bodie as the sunne dooth the moone, as angels doo inferior creatures, and as light dooth darkenesse) there be manie which haue leapt into heauen, and by contemplation placed their pen amongst the founnes of God in writing, and laing abrode to the world (as much as in them laie) the vnsearchable works of the Almighty, whereof we cannot comprehend the least cause, order or perfection, and haue therefore not onelie not receiued punishment, but eternall reward both in bodie and soule; as Enoch was translated to paradise; Elias taken vp in a fierie chariot; Paule rapt vp into the third heauen, with manie others: For which cause I saie, if they which lepped into matters farre beyond the reach of men, to expresse in the meanest degree of perfection, were not punished for meddling therein, and writing thereof; much lesse ought I to be punished with Prometheus in meddling with the discourse of matters vpon the earth, and such as concerne the actions of mortall creatures, as battels, mutations of kingdoms, death of princes, and such other earthly accidents. Into which yet I would not haue so rashlie descended, or taken so hard a prouince in hand, had not (as before I said) the commandement of such as I durst not gainsaie, interponed it selfe as a shield to receiue and beat backe the sharpe darts of enuious tongues. For which cause sith I was bound to him by desert, and that he had better opinion of me than there was cause whie; I feared not (though I deemed it the part of him which doubted the iudgement and reproch of the wiser sort, not to haue hazarded his credit) to enter into this dangerous sea, being not so much furnished with hope to performe it well, as desirous to discharge the request of him, and to shew the hope I conceiued at the well acceptance thereof by thee. In which discourse I had rather good reader thou shouldst complaine, of want of sufficiencie in me to performe so hard a thing: than that he should mislike of my goodwill in answering his desire. And should I feare to enter heereinto, being a thing meet onelie for great counsellors and men priuie of matters of estate; as though there were no place for Greeke poets but onelie to Homer and Sophocles; and for Latine poets, but to Virgill, Ouid, and Horace? Did the singularity and amplex of Platos knowledge in philosophie feare Aristotle to write in the like argument? Or hath Aristotle staied the pen of others? Shall no man be painters but Appelles or Zeukis, or caruers or grauers but Phidias and Lysias? Shall no man be orators but Cicero, Quintilian, and Demosthenes? Shall none write histories but Cæsar, Liuius, Sabellicus, Paulus Iouius, Comineus, Guicciardine, or such like? Or shall none deliuer their traueu to the world because they cannot write in English as did sir Thomas Moore, sir Iohn Checke, Roger Askam, Gefferie Fenton, or Iohn Lillie? Yes trulie, for when they haue doone their best, and written what they can, a man may yet imagine a far more excellent thing, euen of and in that wherein they haue best trauelled, written, painted, or graued, and that euen by the selfe same thing which they haue doonet. And more good reader thou canst not doo either vpon the basenes of my stile, the disorder of the matter, or the barrenesse of supplieng of things requisit for the furnishing and maiestie of an historie, than to suppose and saie that a better forme and method of writing, a more ample discourse for the matter, and a sweeter stile for the manner might haue bene had for the historie of Scotland, than that which I haue set downe. Wherefore if the best writers be subiect to these faults, that when they haue spent all their wit, eloquence, and art, there is yet somewhat to be desired in them, as well as in me the meanest writer, I am content to beare all speedies, and desire thee to thinke what I would doo, and not what I should doo; to excuse me by others, and not to condemne me with others; to accept this in that sort as I haue meant it, and rather with mildnesse to pardon my imperfections, than with malice to barke at my well meaning. Besides which, if thou shalt deeme this worke and continuation of mine for Scotland, ought to haue been consecrated to the fauourable acceptance, and honourable protection of him to whom the first volume was dedicated; I answer (besides that I am to him an estranger, and not to beg vnderferued fauour of anie person, and that the first patrone of this Scottish historie is now in the low countries beyond the seas) this is a thing by me so slenderlie doone, that it meriteth not his honourable iudgement, or the learned view or patronage of anie other of the nobilitie. For if it had, I would then haue bestowed the same vpon those to whom I haue already consecrated my selfe, whatsoeuer I am, hauing long before this covenanted with my bodie, onelie to tie it vnto their good commandement. For hauing but one heart, I cannot dilate it to serue and offer it selfe to manie persons, considering that where is but one heart, there must needs be but one waie: and he that will bestowe one heart vpon manie persons, must diuide the same into manie portions, and so dismember it, that in the end it will be no heart at all; or els he must go to the shambles to provide manie sheepes hearts, to bestow vpon those manie to whom he will bind his manie seruices: for which causes I may neither chouse a new patrone, nor dedicate this to the old, but onelie to thee the fauourable reader. Now before I knit vp this exordium (which may seeme to thee in respect of the following historie, to be like the towne, the gates and entrance whereinto being verie great, occasioned Diogenes to will the inhabitants to shut those great gates, least that little towne did run out thereat) I am to admonish thee good reader, that in all my former additions to the historie of Scotland, I haue neither word for word, nor sentence for sentence, set downe the writings of Lesleus or Buchanan, but haue chosen out the matter as I thought best and apt to my desire. After which sort I haue likewise in this my continuation of the annales of that countrie, not set downe or deliuered things to the world in that sort and stile as I haue receiued intelligence thereof, but onelie culled forth such matter as both the time wherein we liue, the matter whereof I intreat, and the method required therefore, may well beare and challenge. Thus hauing laid before thee, that he writeth best that trulie writeth publike affaires, that I was commanded by my deere freends to enter into this fand: that I cannot discourse of this historie as I willingly would: that I ought not to forbear to write because I cannot in stile and matter equall the best: that they are to be pardoned that attempt high things: that I haue purposed in generall dedicated this labour to the common reader, and not in particular to anie honourable person: and hoping that thou wilt pardon all imperfections, I sparinglie enter into the continuation of the annales of Scotland (being such as thou maist be content to read, and I am contented to write) in this sort as heere followeth, making my first entrance therein with the death of the earle of Lennox, with whome Holinshed finished his chronicle, and so to the matter, after this long and tedious deteining of thee from the same.

THE CONTINVANCE of the annales of Scotland, from the death of the regent Matthew earle of Leneaux.

the noble-

that faction, taking part with the king, assembled themselves for the creating of a new regent, to which function they named three, and those first by oath compelled to yield to the voices of the nobilitie. The three appointed by them were Gilspie Campbell earle of Argyle, James Douglas earle of Morton, and John Arskine earle of War. But in the end, upon consultation which of these for most causes (both beneficial and honorable to the realme and king) were mightiest to wold so troublesome and dangerous an office; in the end it was laid upon the shoulders of the last of the three, to whom (they whole inclining) gave full authoritie to execute the office of a regent. At the first entrance into which place, this Arskine, having nothing more desired or desired to him, than the besiegging and recoverye of the castell and town of Edenborough (out of the hands of the quenes faction) to the use of his master and pupil (wherby to the last calendes of October he was appointed, with a sufficient armie by the last decessed regent his predecessor) he was now hindered thereof by sudden (and untolken for) tumults of the estates of the realme. Whereupon for that instant, the same was proroged to the ides of the said moneth of October. Which delaye was after occasion of great impediment for the recoverye the reof, because it ministered time, power, substance, and succor to the citizens and captains, to more and strengthen the castell and towne. When the sharpe winter, the long nights, the lacke of carriage for the wars preparation, and the want of sufficient furniture therefore (at the same time with the said tumults) occasioned departure from thence, without dispatch of that for which he came.

Certaine moneths after that the regent was gone from thence, there were some few small excursions and skirmishes used amongst them; the victorie inclining to neither part. For the first fight the part of the cuntry) so wrought, that the quenes faction should neither come to handstrokes, nor yet (being surprised) should be intrapped with the deceits of their enemies: because by a pite to her (given out of the highest towre of the castell) they were easily warned to recolle and draw homeward in convenient time. At which notwithstanding, they once felt the smart of the enemy, when all the horse and footmen were come out of the towne to intercept a part of the kings armie. For the kings faction (having first laid an ambush in the vallie) did forth the rest come before the castell, in hope to traine the towne garrison upon them out of the walls of their defense, which their expectation was not deceived. For the said Edensburghers made hast out of the towne, to pursue the last part of the kings armie, which seemed a feble flight, to draw the other part further from defense of the castell. By means wherof, they of the towne did so eagerly pursue them so fast, that in the end they went to far after their enemies, that they drew nere the ensignes of the other ambush, not shewing themselves out of the battie to rescue their fellows put to this feined flight. Which thing being well perceived by the watch of the castell of Edensburgh, forthwith it gave the appointed signe, whereby those on the quenes part (before that they came nere to the place in which they were laid for) began fearfullie to recolle for their better safetie; whose flight was the more troublesome to them, because they knew they were in danger, and could not suspect from whence or how their hurt should come, although they were before warned thereof by the said watch of the towne. In which recolle of the quenes part, the few horsemen which had before seemed the flight (to draw on the other) returned, and made such hast on the backe of the footmen, that the footmen were enforced (with all the speed that might be) to flee unto the citie, the next waye that euerie man could find for his best defense: at what time yet manye of them were wounded, and manye taken prisoner, as well captains and gentlemen of armes, as others.

Whilst these things were thus dolefully performed, in that the towne of Edensburgh was with no more heat sought to be recovered, a miserable misfortune happened in another part of Scotland: for a great slaughter was in the north end of the realme occasioned by this means. There were in that countie two families of great power and authoritie, both hallant and wise, both harboring deadlie foe of lach roted betwene them. These two were of the surnames of Gordon, and of Forboise, wherof the first selues, and by the kings sufferance had manie years gouverned the people adioining vnto them, whereby they purchased both strength amongst themselves, and the helpe, of other men towards them: when contrarie, the Forboises were at wars one with another, dallie impaired their owne strength by their owne slaughters, and in the end wrought their owne confusion, for euerie diuided kingdome cannot long continue. But yet though this secret rancor did still remaine amongst these families, they did not in manie yeares before attempt any open warres the one against the other, rather liuing in secret emulation, than open enite, because they had (in waite of some shew of reconciliation) by marriage intermingled both their families together. Among these Forboises there was one called Arthur (a man of singular wit, and of no lesse ready hand to performe his deuitie) who had alwaies followed the kings part to his uttermost, from the first time of these discords. This man therefore supposing this to be the time (now or never) wherein he must honor himselfe and his name, increase the substance of that part which followed him, & suppress the rage of the Gordons, first laboured to bring his familie to unitie and mutuall love, for all vertue gathered into it selfe is greatest strength. The which if he might compass (as by any possible means he would leaue no stone vnturned that might further it) he was then in so good safetie as he desired. For then was there not any faction or familie in those parts whatsoever, whose wealth or strength he doubted, and whose state or authoritie he did feare.

For furtherance of which design, when date and place was appointed to assemble the Forboises together, Adam Gordon, the brother of the earle of Hunt-leie (devising by all policie he might to hinder the saime, and hauing priuie intelligence thereof by his kin, fauourers, and followers) came with a great power of armed men vnto the same place (at the time appointed for the assemble of the Forboises) to breake off their union. And although there were two troopes of the Forboises, which presentlie appeared in their fight, yet before they could come to strength, Adam Gordon speedilie set vpon the one armie (not ready to be succoured by the other) and in the middle thereof did kill this Arthur Forboise, who being the hope of all that race and now slaine, his death did so amaze the other, that forthwith the rest were sone ouerthrowne, scattered, and fled each one as he might best shift for himselfe. In which unhappie conflict some persons of name were presentlie killed, and manie others taken and reserved for ransome. Whereupon the residue (feearing more crueltie should be vsed vpon the prisoners, loath to haue any more of their race to be cut awaie, and giuing place to the time present) withdrew themselves from the fight, and neuer attempted any thing afterward in the reuenge of their ouerthrow. Which feare and wise suppression of reuenge grew not without iust cause, supposing that their aduersaries (if they were further urged) would shew no more mercie to such as they had prisoners, than they did to the house of Alexander Forboise before time, which they burnt with his great bellied wife and the other of his children.

The eldest brother of Arthur (who was the chiefe of that familie) hauing his house so spoiled, and himselfe hardlie escaping from his enemies hands, hast-ned to the court, from whence (though the matter was in great extremitie) he was by the king to be released. For which cause there were appointed two hundred footmen to such of the nobilitie as fauoured and followed that faction, with letters to the aduising nobilitie to associat themselves to the part of the Forboises. These thus considerat and come together to the rest of the Forboises, with certain other families of their affinitie & neighbours, so acquired the spirit of this Alexander, that he now thought himselfe sufficientlie senled against all the forces of his aduersaries. But as their number increased, so there wanted amongst them one person sufficient to injoy the place of a capitaine, whome the rest might follow. With all the principals and heads of the families were almost young men, and scarce one better than others in degree of calling. Wherefore the offensible being drawn into diuerse companies (for they were enforced to follow severall leaders) John Beth with five hundred horsemen departed to his house not far from thence. Alexander Forboise with his residue and two hundred footmen went to Aber-den, to expell Adam Gordon from thence, and to repare his armie in the iournie.

Adam Gordon (not sleeping his affaires, knowing the preparation of the Forboises, and understanding the approach of his enimie to nere with so small companies) assembled his people, led them out of the towne, and compelled the citizens to follow, to make the number of his armie to seme the greater. Shottlie after, in a field next adioining to the towne, the two companies met, and a sharpe conflict was committed betwene them. In which the kings souldiers (appointed to the Forboises) desirous (more hartlie than wisely) to fight, and aduenturing farther in following of the Gordons (than their shot of powder would continue) they went so far, that in the end (being out of the reach of defense or helpe of their company) they were put to fearfull flight by the hoyment of the Gordons, who pursued them egerlie, and continued the battell untill night. At what time there were not manie of the vanquished slaine, but mostlie taken and reserved as prisoners, amongst which was the said Alexander Forboise taken, after that he had long and valiantlie defended himselfe against his enemies in the same conflict, to the perpetull glorie of that house.

After the suppression of the Forboises in the north parts, the quenes fauourers were sightlie incoura-ged to attempt greater matters. Wherefore assembling their power out of diuerse parts of the kingdome, they bend their minds to the suppressing of Fetworth, a towne which after the manner of the countie is unvallied and vnensured, but onelie with the strength of the inhabitants: which towne (cer-teine yeares past had stronglie resisted the force of the quenes faction. Nere vnto this towne were neighbours Thomas Cat of Fernthorpe, and Walter Scot, both which besides their owne residue had ioined vnto them the people of the next countie, being Lincolne, Eastan, and Eskine, alwaies troubled with robberie and giuen to spoile, who at that time by the libertie of war freelie without restraint, did wander into further countries, to preie, spoile and catch what they could. Besides whom there were also in Westan (aswell by the infection of these countries, as by the custome of spoiling in the wars, for these things were by vse made an other nature and priuilege, as it were from the note and paine of sin) great families defamed with such theft and rapines, and not these alone (with this poison had crept almost ouer all the land) but certeine of the next English pale (being allured with hope of preie, and supposing all things lawfull in ciuill warres) ioined together, and (to make their number the greater, and their power the stronger) called from Chenborough one hundred and twentie harquebushers, chosen out of the chiefe souldiers, to be assistant vnto them.

paration tended) with speeie & fearefull messengers signifie vnto John Areskine earle of Spar & regent, the present danger wherein they stood, craving some succor of light furnished souldiers to be sent to them, which forthwith was granted accordingly. Whereupon Walter Ear of Stefford, being called before the regent for that cause, had the charge of such aid granted vnto him, as a person who both for balure & experience was of sufficiencie to discharge anie such matter laied vpon him. Besides which, a conuenient number of sufficient souldiers, gathered out of the counties adioining, for that season assembled themselues in defense of the towne, & ioined their armie with them at Jedworth. At what time also to strike more feare in the one part & to aduance the courage of the other part, it was noised amongst both armies that William Ruthwine with a hundred shot and certeine hoisemen (wherof he brought part with him, and part he gathered out of the marches adioining) were at the same time coming to Durburge with the said Ruthwine. All which notwithstanding, the queenes faction trusting to their owne strength consisting in multitude (for they were in number thre thousand men) did earlie in the morning draw towards the towne, to prevent the coming of such succours as both were promised, looked for, and then almost at hand. Which being by Ruthwines partlie before suspected, he hastened the people with more speed to follow them at the heeles, and by continuall shot worted the taile of his aduersaries with often assaults and skirmishes.

Walter Ear also ioining vnto him and to his complices the towne men (readie to defend their files, their goods, their wives, and their children) toke the direct waie towards his enemies, to the end the better to suppress them and their vnited force. Which when the aduerser part perceived, forthwith they retired to places of more defense, lest they shuld incounter their enemies with doubtfull battell; and least being set vpon before and behind, they might be subdenlie inclosed, before they could be able to turne themselves, either to escape, or to prevent the approaching enemy. At what time such as sought after spoile, and were allured to that warre with hope of gaine, being now by that means defrauded of their preie, when they saw the towne manfullie defended, and the kings part readie and stronglie come forth to battell, left the field, and departed euerie man to his owne house, as it was nearest to the place where they then remained. Whose sudden flight, without any occasion of danger, being vnderstood of the chiefe of the rest of such as were of the queenes faction (supposing at the first nothing lesse than that the enemy would make vpon them) they also followed after the others, railed their campe, and departed to Hawike with the rest of their followers and companie of footmen, hoping thereby to escape all danger, by reason of the sharpenesse of the winter and late fall of the snow, which would stae the following of the enemy.

But Ruthwine, iudging it best to vse the opportunity of time, did before date so speedilie lead his armie to Hawike; that he was within a mile of his enemies, before they could by anie means be certified of his coming. Whose speedie and vnlooked for approch did strike such extreame feare into the hearts of those which possessed Hawike, that there was no place left for anie consultation; but presentlie that eu-erie one shoud shift for himselfe as well as he might. Wherevpon suddenlie bringing forth their hoisles and footmen, and following the course of the next river, they attempted to withdraw into places of more safetie for themselves, and further from their enemies. But the hoisemen of Ruthwine speedilie following at their heeles, so prevented their de-uise, that forsaking their footmen, they fled ouer all the countie to the places betwixt Andwine vnto them.

Upon which the footmen being thus left to the spoile and preie of their enemies, did (for their more safegard) hide themselves in a little wood adioining to the said river. In which, being on euerie side beset with the force of their aduersaries (sallie determined to preie vpon them) they did in the end wholie yield themselves with submission to their courtiers. Where-vpon (sith they were not able like prisoners, for their number was ouer great to be caried about from place to place in that sharpe winter) they were (vpon their oth to returne and become true prisoners) suffered harmlesse of bodie, and losselesse of furniture to depart, some few being still retained in that place as pledges for the others departed companie. But when the time of their returne approached, Ruthwine die, deceiuing their faith with his light promises, for had them to returne at their daie appointed, and made them incur the note of perurie. The rest of the winter, and all the next spring was passed forth with light skirmishes on both parties of the kings and queenes factions, in which few lost their liues, and of that few more on the queens than kings part.
For the queenes fauourers, remaining in the mounteins next adioining to the citie, whilste they would take occasion and aduantage to performe anie thing well, would (scarce entring into the danger of the conflict) for the most part retire and flie into the citie for more defense.

In the meane time, while these things were thus ordered, there came manie ambassadores out of England, to pacifie these discords growne to these great extremities, betwene the king and the imprisoned queenes factions. But the same ambassage so well meant by the queene of England, and reieced by the seditions of Scotland, sorted not to that end which was meant, nor as the state of Scotland required.
Wherefore these ambassadores returned home without anie such dispatch as might answer their tra-uels, their mistresses care and loue, and the vnitie of that quarelsome people: by reason that the French men fauouring the cause of the banished queene, did not onelie hinder the peace and quiet of the Scots, for the benefit of the realme; but also sought warres for the destruction of the naturall subiects, and to bring in their owne gouernement; who for the furtherance thereof, did with great promises intertaine the apt minds of the quarrelling faction, to kindle and mainteine the fire of continuall warre, vntill such time as by force they had gotten the vpper hand, and brought the kings fauourers to destruction. For the better support wherof, the French king sent some portion of monie, which being of it selfe not great; or such as their necessitie required, seemed rather sufficient to nourish an hope of abilitie to mainteine the warres, than fullie to dispatch or desraie the charges of the affaires therein; and that the rather, because some part of that monie was euer deuoured by such as had the cartage thereof.

Amongst these things there still continued, for a few moneths, certeine light skirmishes to little purpose betwene the aduerser parties. But the greater companie, who could not satifis their eagles minds with litle flies, abstained not from robbing and burning the countie. For Adam Gordon, entring into Angus, besieged the house of William Dowglas of Glenbernie; but after that long bessege, perceiuing that the man whom he sought for, was not to be found there, he cruellie destroyed all whatsoeuer there was left, consuming it with fire and sword.
Which tyrannie did strike such fearfull impression into the hearts of those of Dundee, that they despairing of their owne abilitie to resist them, called their neighbours of fife unto their aid, with they were next adjoining unto them, unto whom also Gordon was a persecuting enemy continually in all that possible he might, because they constantlie and subiect like did in all dutie support the kings part.

Blackenelle betraied.

At which time Blackenelle being betraied to the Hamiltons by the keeper of that castell, did greatly hinder the traffike and passage betwene Leith and Sterling. For which cause the regent as a person that heedfullie looked into the dangers of that time, and with wise foresight sought to prevent following evils, brake downe all the mills about Edinburgh, furnished all the noble mens houses and places of defense with garrisons nere unto the towne, and closed vp all passage to and from the citie. For now there was fresh skirmishing, and manie on both parts, as well of the king as of the deposed quene were taken prisoners, put to their ransome, compelled to abjure their faction, kept in continuall prison, or else presentlie slaine.

These things thus depending, and the king and the deposed quenes faction contending still to support their parts, the matter did daillie more and more grow to great slaughters: which being well perceived by foreine nations (pitieing the present calamities, and seeking to provide to staie the following dissension of that countrie which was like to be at hand upon these ciuill and unnaturall warres, if better order were not taken therefore) the quene of England as the kings next and louing neighbour, and the French king also the confederat of Scotland, sent their ambassadoys into the realme, to see what qualification might be had in these troublesome and dangerous times of the kings minority: hoping either to set a finall end to these inconueniences, or at least to mitigate and staie that furie, that it should not at that present, or during the kings minority passe any further. For the accomplishment whereof, sir William Duriie knight, and Thomas Randolph esquier, were sent from the quene of England: and monsieur de Croque, who had also bene ambassadoy out of France into Scotland before that time, was now againe sent thither from the French king.

These much about one time arriving in Scotland, and joining together concerning the execution of their ambassage, dealt so effectually therein, that in the end they concluded an abstinence of warre to be had betwene the parties of the king and quenes faction, from that time which was about the first of August, to continue untill the first of December following: and so brought both the parties in conclusion to relie and abide the full determination of all quarrels to be set downe by the quene of England, and the French king. Which being done the ambassadoys returned home, monsieur Croque into France, and sir William Duriie and maister Randolph into England.

The death of the earle of Marre.

In October following died the earle of Marre, regent of Scotland, of a lingering sicknesse (as some affirme) but Lesleus saith lib. 10. pag. vltima, that morte repentina concidit being buried in Allowaie a place of his owne, situate foure miles from Sterling, to whom in the erleldome succeeded John erle of Marre, who after fled into England, as in this following discourse shall appeare. Which John Arskine earle of Marre the regent did marrie Annable Purrie daughter to the lard of Tullebarton, by whom he had issue this John, which succeeded him in the erleldome of Marre (as is before said) and one daughter which was married to Archibald Dowglas now earle of Angus: but she died without issue. Of which deceased Arskine earle of Marre, Buchanan composed these verses commendatorie, expressing the nature, vertues, qualities, and valour of the said earle in this foyme and maner following:

*Si quis Ariskinum memoret per bella ferocem, Pace grauem nulli, tempore utroque pium:
Si quis opes sine fastu, animum sine fraude carentem, Rebus in ambiguis suspitione fidem, Siquis ob has dotes, sanis iactata procellis, Figit in illius patris fusa pedem:
Vera quidem memoret, sed non & propria: laudes Qui pariter petet has vnus & alter erit!
Istud & proprium est, longe quod in ordine vita Nil odium aut linor, quod reprehendit, habet.*

Upon the death of which earle Marre the regent, there happened long consultation for the election of a new regent to succeed in his place, that might in all respects defend the kings person and the realme, as he had done before. Wherefore the noble men, assembling for that cause, did in the moneth of December, one moneth and more after the death of that last regent, elect by one consent the earle Morton to that office, a man no lesse wise than prouident, and such a person, as both for the nobilitie of his birth, good seruice to the realme and to the king, did well merit the charge. After whose election, the two princes, the English quene, and the French king, minding to make a full conclusion of peace and amitie, and to settle the kingdome of Scotland in due obedience and vnitie, did in the meane time that the abstinence of warre before named continued, send their ambassadoys to the regent and states of Scotland: which ambassadoys were maister Henrie Killigrew esquire for England, and monsieur de Weracke for France. But as monsieur de Weracke was dislodged from the coasts of France, and upon the sea in his tourneie to Scotland; he was apprehended and taken, before he could attaine to the shore of Scotland: whereby he neuer came on land amongst the Scots to performe his ambassage. Which being knowne to the Scots, and they finding that their most aid & surest friendship would come forth of England from that prince, whom religion, blood, affinity, and neighborhood had moued to like and follow, did in the end resolve themselves, that both the affection, as well of the yong king, and of the imprisoned quene, should referre themselves to the quene of England, to make a finall conclusion of all controuersies and troubles which were then amongst them.

Whereupon the said Henrie Killigrew made a quiet end and pacification of all matters & debates betwene all the lordes of Scotland after this maner. In februarye following the new creation of this regent Morton, there assembled at Perth, or saint Johns towne (by especiall edict therefore) the greatest part of the nobilitie of Scotland, as the regent, the earles of Huntleie, Argile, Atholl, and others: who pitieing the miserie of their countrie, condescended that the quene of England should by hir ambassadoy, set a quiet end and order amongst them. Which the said Henrie Killigrew did in all points accordingly, extending the same vnto all the nobilitie of Scotland, except such as were in the castell of Edinburgh: which were the lord Hume, the lord of Orange, secretaire Livingston, the lord Raskallrege, and others: who rather desirous of warre than peace, as persons mettelie well inured therewithall, would not consent to any peace, other than such as might stand with their owne liking, and support of the imprisoned quenes faction, which they earnestlie followed, as after shall more appeare.

But before this finall agreement, as I haue bene crediblie informed, there was a parlement called at Edinburgh to begin the fifteenth of Ianuarie, in which were assembled the earle Morton regent, the earles of Angus, Argile, Glencarne, Calsels, sels, Eglinton, Mountroffe, and young Sparthall, for the earle Sparthall his father: the lords of Ruthwen, Lindseie, Clames, Simple, Boid, Sparthall, Hennis, Craie, Disphant, Sincleir, Fozbois, Ca-chart, Dhilltra, Somerwell, and others: with the commissioners of the borowis of Edenborough, Strueling, Perth, Dundie, saint Andrews, Glasgow, Lethgo, and Couper. Out of which number of this assemble were chosen for to be lords and iudges, to determine the articles propounded in that parlement, the earles of Argyle, Glenearne, and Mountroffe, the lords Ruthwen, Lindseie, Boid, Simple, and Hennis, with the bishops of saint Andrews & Dkenele, the abbats of Aberboith, Dunfermling, Canbuskineth, and Newbottle, besides the prior of saint Marie ile and Portinake, which were also adioined unto them: all which persons so passed, named, and appointed, determined, ratified, & passed these articles following.

The articles and acts of the parlement holden at Edenborough the 25 of Januarie.

- 1  The approbation and ratification of the regiment.
- 2 Annent the true and holie kirke, and deteing of the true ministers & members thereof.
- 3 That name of the aduersaries and enemies of Gods truth shall inioie the patrimonie of the kirke.
- 4 That like of the disobedients as shall be receiued to mercie and pardon, profess the true religion, and sweare to resist the decrees and execution of the counsell of Trent.
- 5 The establishing of the regiment, in case that charge yet baile during the kings minozitie.
- 6 Annent recovering of the tewels, householdstufte, munition, and moueables, such as sometime were the quhenes the kings mother, to his highnesse vse and behoefe.
- 7 A declaration, that all things done in the kings name and authoritie is lawfull, and of the inualiditie of all things attemptid in anie name, and vnder color of quhatsoener other authoritie, since his highnesse coronation.
- 8 Touching motion to be made for a league with the quhenes maiestie of England, for the defense of forein inuasion, for the cause of religion; and that others professing the true religion, may be drayne into the same.
- 9 The declaration and interpretation of the act annent masse and gleibis.
- 10 Annent the interpretation of the popes and other counterfet bulls or prouision to benefices with antedats.
- 11 Approbation with some addition to the act of priuie counsell, made in the reigne of the quhenes the kings mother, annent the disposition of benefices to ministers of the kirke.
- 12 Annent execution against persons excommunicat.
- 13 Annent the reparation of parish kirks.
- 14 Annent proceeding in cause of priuozle.
- 15 Annent the reparation of the destructions, biggings, and other damneges within the towne of Edenborough during the late trouble.
- 16 A confirmation of the infesment of certeine rents to the pedagog or college of Glasgow. All which acts thus fullie passed in this parlement, there was the same aduise giuen to the regent, touching the receiving to pardon of persons guiltie to the slaughter of the earle of Lennox late regent, & touching suspension and delaing of pursue of the murder of the kings father. Whereof much being spoken, and thought god to be followed; yet there was nothing enacted that might establish the same.

During the time of which session of his parlement, manie occurrents deseruing remembrance happened after the said sixteenth of Januarie. For ^{Strimishes about Ederborough.} Edenborough castell being somewhat distressed, the castilians were put from fallieng out of the castell gate, where capteine Craisford, and capteine Hume laie with their hands to keepe them in. Notwith- standing all which, they within repaired vnto a pornerne in the northside of the castell besides saint Cutberts church, and saint Margarets well, where they issued and set water at their pleasure: which being espied by their enemies, capteine Michaele and his band came from Wondiske to stop their passage thereto. Who within thre daies after such his ap- proch, destroyed their well, and enforced them to keepe within the walls of the castell: at that time the re- gent advanced his trenches made against the ca- stell, from the bulworke or spurre of that castell to the well part: and from thence, to saint Cutberts kirke: so that with the water lieng on the south- westside, and the regents power on the other side, the castell was wholie inuironed. During which siege, the sixteenth of the same moneth, the castilians, to feare such as were assembled in the forenamed parlement kept within the towne of Edenborough, bestowed fourtescore and seven great shot vpon the towne, which harmed not anie one creature, but a poze dog that was slaine before the doze of the regents house: although men, women, and children did ballie frequent and passe the streets of the towne. Which was a rare matter, but yet not moze strange than this: that there was not slaine on the regents part (from the first of the moneth of Januarie vntill this time, either by great or small shot in the towne or trenches, ^{Strimishes or other- wise}) aboue six persons, and within the castell but thre, with as manie hurt betwene the tolbooth and the spurre of the castell, the cause whereof grew by reason of thre traueses made ouerthwart the streets to saue the people, besides the other trenches made against the castell: at that time also the tolbooth and the church was fenced with a rampier forced of turfes, sagots, and other stufte fit for that purpose. Whereby the lords of the parlement did as safelie assemble and sit in the tolbooth, and the people went as quietlie and safelie to the church to heare di- uine seruice, as they at anie time did before the warres began, and before that the castell was be- sieged.

During which doings in the castell & the towne, there was an abstinence granted at the sute of the ambassadoys of England for the duke and his ad- herents, vntill the foure and twentieth of Februarie: in which meane time, certeine lords were appointed to conferre with the said ambassadoys for an accord to be had betwene the king and imprisoned quenes faction. Wherevpon sir James Walsford came to the regents grace, obtained pardon for his offense, and earnestlie laboured to further this agreement. The earle of Argyle was aduanced to the honour of the chancelorship. And Alexander Arskine mas- ter of Sparre was appointed to haue the keeping of the kings person vpon certeine conditions, for the performance whereof he was to find foure sur- ties, lords of the parlement, to be bound for him bo- die and lands, hauing fiftene daies appointed vnto him to consider thescof, whether he would enter in- to so great a charge or no. And if in case he should refuse to accept the same, it was further resolved and concluded, that the erles of Glenearne and Bur- gaban, quhan, the lord Glanes, and master Marshall should have the keeping of the king quarterlie one after another. And if anye of the four should happen, during the time of his quarterlie gouernement, to be sicke, or not able to execute that function; that then the lord Lindseie should be assistant to him in that gouernement, during that time. Which being thus on all parts concluded, James Marcardie arrived in the Blackenelle in a small pinnesle, and entred the castell of Edenborough, with such shonite as he had provided to bring thither. Which occasioned the castell of Edenborough to be reassaged and inuironed both by sea and land, and was the cause that capteine Wyse fallieng forth with other of his companie to forage the countrie, and to provide vittels, were taken by the regents companie. Notwithstanding all which, yet the others within the castell continued their purpose, and defended the same against the regent and his companie, farre otherwise than was supposed that either they could or would do.

Whereupon the regent of Scotland solicited the quene of England, in the behalfe, and for the succor of the yong king of Scots his cousine, thus grieuouly molested with the warres of his owne people. So that the quene of England sent a power of fiftene hundred Englishmen to the siege of Edenborough castell, ouer whome sir William Durie knight and marshall of Berwicke was made general, with such captiues as follow; which were sir Francis Russell knight, third sonne to Francis erle of Bedford with other captiues, as Read, Parleie, Wood, Bickwell, Pikeman, Gam, Case, Carre, Errington prouost marshall, Aston, Sterleie capteine of the pioners, and capteine Barton. To whom also to serue at their owne free will these gentlemen of name, sir George Carle, sir Henrie Leie knights, Thomas Cicill eldest son of the lord tresuroz of England, William Banolles, Sutton, Cotton, Belwaite, Pier, Cilneie, William Billegreue, a manie other gentlemen of good estimation did associat themselves with conuenient number to attend vpon them. These with their generall passed from Berwicke to Lesh, where they met with maister Henrie Billegreue the quene of Englands ambassador, whose care, trauell, & furtherance at that time deserued no small commendation; and with the Scottish nobilitie, & such as they had assembled to ioin with the English in the behalfe of the yong king against such as tooke part with the deposed quene. Which Scottish nobilitie and gentlemen of Scotland were the earle Morton regent, and such other earles and gentlemen as were tied and alied to him by kindnes and kindred, & such as fauoured the yong king, distressed by the deposed quene, as was pretended. After the iointing of these two nations, they on the five and twentieth of Aprill marched towards Edenborough: and the same daie sir William Durie the generall summoned the castell of that towne in forme as followeth.

The summons giuen to the castell of Edenborough.

Sir William Marcardie, sometimes of Orange knight, forsomuch as the quens maiestie my soueraine ladie, vpon the earnest request of hir deere cousin the king of Scots your soueraine lord made to hir highnes by his regent, nobilitie, & estates of Scotland, after all good meanes bled to haue reduced you to a dutifull obedience of his authoritie by treatie, which he shert to you haue not duly harkened vnto, to the onlie hinderance of the vniuersall peace in this realme, by withholding that his highnesse castell, meaning

(as it seemeth) to reserue the same for a receptacle of fozen forces, to the manifest dangers both of this realme and of my souerains; and therefore necessarie to remoue so perillous a danger to both the realmes. For which consideration hir maiestie hath sent hir aid and succors, men, ordinance, and munition vnder my charge and leading, for the expugnation and recouerie of the said castell to the said kings vse and behoefe. And therefore, according to hir maiesties commandement and commission; this shall be in due manner to warne, require, and summon you, that you render and deliuer the said castell with the whole ordinance, artillerie, munitions, iewels, household stuffe, and such other implements within the same to me, and to the vse and behoefe of the king your soueraine and his regent in his name, immediately after this my letter of summons or knowledge of the same shall come to you. Which if you obey, as of dutie you ought; then shall I in hir maiesties name interpone my selfe to trauell with the regent, counsell, and nobilitie here for the safetie of your liues, &c: otherwise, if you continue in your former obstinacie, abiding the canon, then no further to looke for grace or fauor; but you and the rest within that castell, to be pursued to the vttermost, and holden as enemies to hir maiestie, your owne soueraine, and countrie. Given at Edenborough by me sir William Durie knight generall of hir maiesties forces now in Scotland, this five and twentieth daie of Aprill, in the yeare of Christ 1573.

This letter by the lord Orange capteine of the castell thus in due sort receiued, he not regarding the contents thereof, nor considering the mild disposition of such as went about to spare their blood, did vnterlie denie the surrender of the castell, and with all force determined to defend themselves. Wherewith the English generall greatly grieued, did incontinently rebellue such answer to the said lord Orange as wrought an bitter discontent and mislike in the man. By meanes of which the pioners attending their charge, with expedition applied the casting of trenches and erecting of mounts or fortresses to plant the artillerie thereupon against the castell. After which euerte one hastening the cause of his comming, & ioining their force together, began to inuiron the towne, & to laie siege to the castell in foue severall places, where were foue severall fortresses erected for that cause, intituled by these names. The first mount allotted to the regent, had the name of the kings mount, the second the generall thereof the English sir William Durie did possesse, the third was in charge of sir George Carle, the fourth was called sir Henrie Leies mount, and the fift fell to the gouernement of Thomas Sutton maister of the ordinance in the north parts of England. The whole number of which armie vnder paie was two thousand, whereof fiftene hundred were English, and the other five hundred Scots: besides the nobilitie and gentlemen with their companie, and the citizens of Edenborough defended with thirtie peeces of artillerie containing sir canons, nine demicanons, nine culuerings, and sir factes. Whilste the armie without was thus preparing for to assaile the companie within, the captiue of the castell (to hinder their worke) liberallie saluted the pioners & other soldiors with such artillerie as they had within the castell, and vpon and about the walles thereof, whereby manie were hurt, some slaine, but more hindered before the trenches and mounts might be brought to their due perfection, for defense of the assailants, and offense of the assailed. In which action also the aduerse part forgot not to requite the castilians, but immediately after that the pioners and laborers had finished

When he mounts. At what time they gave him a vehement and sharpe assault to the castell, although that the enemye beat thereof began not until the seventeenth date of June following. In which siege on the said seventeenth date of June, the castell was most toughly assailed by the Scottish shot of canons discharged against the same. At what time those peeces so well performed their parts against Dundas tower, that the force of the English cannons was easie to be then making after some short time. Which assault continued until the one and twentieth date of June following; on which date the whole batterie began not againe as before against part, but whole round about on every side of the castell. For until then Dundas tower was on the right hand of the entrance, but after that date they laid out their power in every place, offensive and defending by others soldiers, as well within the castell as without the mounds and trenches; in that sharpe conflict hunting and killing manie of the English and Scots. Whereupon the diligence of the English began to be great, that they forthwith displaced the mounds within the castell, and strooke one of their greatest peeces out in the month; whereby the same was broken, and the castilians force somewhat abated.

After this, on the six and twentieth date of the said month of June, there was a fresh assault given at seven of the clocke in the morning to the Spurre (a place of defense or blockhouse before the said castell) which by the assailants was taken, & forthwith upon the entrance therin was the banner of the generall displayed and set up, to declare who possessed the same, to the great discomfort of them in the castell. For although before they had lost the use of one of their great peeces; that their wailes were battered, that some of their men were slain, & that they had almost all their water taken from them: yet would they not yield, neither did anye begin to despayre of keeping the castell, or repelling the enemye, until such time as the English had now gotten the possession of the Spurre.

And during the time that these gave the assault to the Spurre, there was an other band of English men and Scots, that had in charge to make the way of a fresh assault, at the west part of the castell; to the end that such as layed batterie to the Spurre, might with more ease to themselves, and lesse suspicion of the contrarye part, obtaine the said Spurre. But this last named band, over hastilie putting themselves in adventure beyond the limits of their charge, were repelled and driven to the recoile, with the hurt and losse of chiefe persons, or thereabouts. All which notwithstanding, the castilians (perceiving their chiefe defense the Spurre to be lost, and not greatly relying of this small victorie over those which assailed them on the west side) did the same date by a justissime demand parley: which they obtained with truce of peace from that date, until the eight and twentieth of June next following. For which cause the lord of Pittarvot was let downe by a rope from the castell, and after him the lord of Orange, capitaine of the said castell, with Robert Spelvine; all which came to have conference with the generall sir William Dornie, & such other persons as were sent to accompanie him about the same. In the end, upon much conference had betwene the Scottish lords and the generall, the castell was the same eight and twentieth date (in which the truce ended) delivered up into the hands of the said sir William Dornie, which he kept in his possession for a certeine time; during whose abode in the castell, he set up and spread his ensignes and banners upon sundrie parts of the walls of the same.

After this done, the generall (after quiet possession had, not determining to retaine it unto his mistresse use, although he was onelie appointed by him to aid the king of Scots, and such of the nobilitie as took his part) did after (according to his commission) deliver over the said castell to the use of the young king of Scots; for which cause not meaning utterly to spoile the castell, he gave but part of the spoile to the use of the soldiers, leaving the cannons and other artillerie to the kings pleasure. For before the surrender of the castell, it was agreed, that if the Englishmen had by force taken it, as they obtained it by composition, that then they should whole have moied the full spoile by the space of three dates, the artillerie onelie excepted, which should be carried away by the English. But although for these causes following, the same could not abide any long siege, but must of necessity yield it selfe, there was everie part of the said spoile given unto the soldiers upon the deliverie of the same castell to sir William Dornie. The causes of which surrender were manie.

First, for that they were deprived of water, because the well within the castell was choked with the ruines of the castell wailes; & the other well without could not serve them, because there was a mound made to hinder them. An other water there was (which was unknowne to such as were without the castell) and was taken from them by the losse of the Spurre; out of which they were wont to have a pint a daie for everie souldier. The other causes of surrender were these.

Secondlie, diverse persons were sicke, especiallie thorough drink of the water of saint Margarets well without the castell on the north side, which had bene poisoned by some of their enemies.

Thirdlie, diverse others were hurt.

Fourthlie, not manie to mainteine the castell, and they not able to take anye rest, being so pleyed and dailye wearied with batterie.

Fifthlie, diverse of the souldiers divided in opinions.

Sixthlie, some were no souldiers at all.

Seaventhlie, that no aid was to be looked for by the waile of France.

The eight and chiefe cause was, that the regent and his forces planted in the strengths round about, and the hostlemen daylie and nightlie watching and rising, which held and took from them all bittels, and had brought them to great scant of food before the siege began. All these eight causes moved the said surrender of the castell.

After that the castell was thus gotten, the sixteenth date of June following, the prisoners were delivered by the said sir William Dornie, in the presence of sundrie Scots & Englishmen, unto the regent; and that done, the same date sir William Dornie departed with his power to Berwick. The names of the prisoners were these; sir William Birkenhead, lord of Orange, and capitaine of the castell of Denborough, the lord Hume, William Spetellan, lord of Leithington secretaire, the lord of Pittarvot constable of the castell, the countesse of Argile, the ladye of Leithington and the ladye of Orange, with others. But yet the privat soldiers & others of meaner sort were suffered to depart with bag and baggage.

Thus was the castell of Denborough wone, as you have heard, which by the common opinion of men was impregnable, and not to be taken by force; inasmuch as manie thought it took the name of the maiden castell, for that it had not bene wone at any time before except by famine or practise. Which opinion being common is so much the faller, in that the common sort do embrace it, for that they will incline to common fables. For this castell was not named the maiden castell, because it was never taken

Ben by force: but because the pictures of those ui darentur: seruiri & preceptis ad hunc modum: & uisitatem informari solent, condidit. A little before which, the said Lesleus writeth that Fergusus did. *Christi in carnem aduentum 305, & uisita-tem tempore Estadus Britonum & Christianus Pictorum imperium tenebant. Now this king Christianus that built Agnesda, liued before Christ thre hundred and five yeares by the Scots account, and Eborac or Ebianke liued nine hundred foure score & nine yeares before Christ: so that the Englishmen make this townte more ancient than the Scots. But as Lesleus hath mistaken himselfe, following Boetius, to place Camledunum in Scotland: so hath he appointed Edenburgh to be built by the Scots, being built by the Brittaines. But true it might be that E-borac first builded it, & that being at the space of thre hundred foure score and foure yeares: wasted and bitterly decayed, the same was after erected by Christianus, and after repaired by Ebo. The castell of which towne, being sometime appointed for the bringing up of the daughters of the noblemen of the Isles, until they were marriageable, was for that cause (and not because it was neuer wonne by force) called the maiden castell, as the said Lesleus affirmeth. But after, when Christianus came into Scotland, it was called (as I coniecture) Agnesda, because it was the castell that stood on saint Agnes hill, & not before the coming of Christ so called Agnedam, as hitherto it hath bene set downe, but not rightly: as I haue with reuerence speake under correction of such as by better authoritie can disprove that I saie.

But here let vs a little leaue the countrie soile of Scotland, and such things as were there then done, and take somewhat of the persons of that realme, who performed matter of valour in forreine countries. Whilste the towne of Leiden was stronglie besieged (in the moneth of June) and that the townefolke (having a needfull and hardfall care) were altogether imployed about making of provision of all such things as were deemed necessarie for the defense of the same towne, the principall part of the commandatores arriued in Boninell quarters, Coicum, and Lowielsen. Whilste the prince and the estates of the low countries made no great account thereof, by reason that Boninell (which was well furnished of all things necessarie for the wars) was vnder the custodie of capitaine Baskoure, colo-nell of the Scottishmen, who had there attending vpon him the number of teathen Scottish soldiers. Which Scots desirous to performe some matter of valour, dailie sallied out of the towne with some of the citizens and gentlemen Hollanders, in which often meeting they valiantlie skirmished with the enimies.
Whereby in the end amongst their mutinie confusions there were manie warlike exploits performed by the Scots, which deserved not to be forgotten: as well for that they often repelled the enimies, and kept their strength together: as for that they being few in number, aduentured (beyond the hope of good hap, by incounterling with a greater troope of such as came against them, than they were themselves): either to returne victors, or to lose their liues. As which I com-miserably will also the same Scots continuing in those to do duties, performed manie other matters of martiall exploits: which I will set downe in this place. For which haue being contented of some of the Scots (whom these animals & chieftie concerning) such things might supplie the default of sufficient matter of Scotland to furnish the same, and for that I haue herie described of the performances of some militarie by and with others of that nation who for partie: but to that countrie sought, and for clear-ring some snuff or opinion conceived against them of their actions in their countie: should haue sought to further me in the so my labour: I must leaue things done in Scotland, and turne my pen to other places, providing matters to helpe my manner of discourse, and inform the reader to the deliuer an action performed by the Scots in the same low countries: where they were then in service: & against the Spaniards, vnder the paie of the prince of Orange, did that which deserves to be forgot.

These Scots were for: remaining in those countries, serving vnder the command of their colonell fur-named Baskoure, did in Januarie set forth against with the Spaniards at a place called the Shewdale, distant not much more than a mile from Elcege, where was a long and sharpe conflict betweene these two nations. In which by the industrie of battell (for the most part) being victorie vnto the stronger side, a great multitude of them were left dead in the place, and the rest by hardie same themselves by flight from their enimies: who yet felt not this overthrow to be so much a griefe, but that they last manie of their people before the Scots were put to the sword.
But leading these Scots in the middle of the wars of these countries vnder the prince of Orange, we are to come to other matters following by succession of time: which hath deliuered to vs that Margaret the daughter & heire of Sparghale Dowglas earle of Angus, died in England the tenth of March in the yeare of our redemption 1577, beginning the yeare in the Annintiation of the virgin which lady being borne at Harbottell castell in England in the yeare of Christ 1525, was afterward brought up in England, and then being put in assistance in the eight and twentieth yeare of king Henrie the eight, being the yeare of Christ 1546, to Thomas Howard youngest brother to the duke of Northfolke, he was that yeare committed prisoner to the tower, but after let at libertie the last of October, in the nine and twentieth yeare of king Henrie the eight, in the yeare 1547, married to Sparghale Stewart earle of Lennox by the consent of Henrie the eight king of England, in the yeare of our saluation 1544. After which, being tossed with both fortunes, sometime in aduersitie, & sometime in prosperitie, he was notwithstanding alwaies honorable intertained in England, as both his birth in respect of his kinglie blood, and his calling in respect of his place, did worthily deserve. In the end, to cut off all his other aduersities, and to draw to things falling in with his knowledge, he was on the two and twentieth of April in the yeare 1563 (vpon the ma-riage of his sonne Henrie Stewart lord Darnley vnto Marie Stewart queene of Scots) commanded by the queene of England first to keepe his chamber in the Whitehall the princes court and palace, where he remained vntill the two and twentieth date of June next ensuing, and was then by sir Francis Knolles (one of the priue counsell and vicechamberleine to the queene of England) and by some other of the gard conueied to the towne of London by water, in which place he remained prisoner untill that his sonne the said Henrie Stewart was mis-rablie and traitorously slaine by the earle Bothwell and his complices (as some affirme, but how trulie I know not) upon the twentieth of february one thousand five hundred thre score & six. In which yeare, on the two and twentieth of the same moneth, the said ladie Margaret was discharged out of the towre and set at libertie, who still remaining in England did (as before is said) in the thre score & second yeare of hir age, and in the first yeare of hir widowhood, surrender hir soule to God, being most hono-rablie buried & answerable to hir calling in the great chapell of Westminster (built by Henrie the seventh king of England) among the kings of that realme in an inward chapell standing on the right & the southside of the said great chapell. The yeare before whose death his sonne Charles Stewart earle of Lennox (having before married Elisabeth the dangh-ter of sir William Candish, by whome he had issue Arbella) did also depart this life. Over the bodies of both which persons, Thomas Fowler erector to the said ladie Margaret, did with the gods of the said ladie erect a costlie and statelie toorne of rich stone and curious workmanship, with the picture of that ladie, as livelie, and as well coloured as art might afford it, about which monument is graven this memorable epitaph declaring his nobilitie, as insueth.

At the head of the toorne is set downe Memoria sacrum.

 regibus cognatione coniunctissima, Iacobi sexti regis auiæ,

On the right side of which toorne is this ingrauen.

*Margareta potens, Viriute potentior, ortu Regibus ac proavis nobilitata suis: Inde Calidonyi australibus, inde Britannis A edita principibus, principibusque parens: Quæ mortis fuerant soluit latissima morti, Henrie second sonne to this ladie and father to James the first now king. This Henrie was murdered at the age of one and twentie yeares. Charles the yongest sonne was earle of Lennox father to the late Arbell. He died at the age of one and twentie yeares, and is here intombed.

On the left side of the toorne is this ingrauen.

This ladie had to hir great grandfather king Edward the fourth, to hir grandfather king Henrie the seventh, to hir uncle king Henrie the eighth, to hir cosine germane king Edward the first, to hir brother king James of Scotland the first, to hir sonne king Henrie the first, to hir grandchild king James the first, having to hir great grandmother and grandmother two quæns both named Elisabeth, to hir mother Margaret quæne of Scots, to hir aunt Marie the French quæne, to hir cousines germane Marie and Elisabeth quæns of England, to hir neece and daughter in law Marie quæne of Scots.

At the foot of hir toorne is thus written.

Here lieth the noble ladie Margaret countesse of Lennox, daughter and sole heire to Archibald Dowglasie earle of Angus, by Margaret quæne of Scots his wife, that was eldest daughter to king Henrie the seventh, which bare unto Mattheu earle of Lennox his husband, foure sonnes and foure daughters.] Which honourable toorne, with these superscriptions, was erected for the said ladie, and finished in the yeare of our redemption 1578, being begun and almost perfected in the life of the said ladie Margaret. This ladie being (as before is thewed) countesse of Lennox and Angus, it will not be amisse to declare in this place, what beame of both the said earledoms, as well in hir life, as after hir and hir sonne Charles his death. Touching Angus, this ladie Margaret, upon the marriage of hir son Henrie lord Darneleite, which was solemnized the nine and twentith daie of Iulie 1565, to Marie quæne of Scots, did giue the said earledome with all the rights and members thereof unto the said quæne Marie, to dispose as fell best unto hir liking. Whereupon the said quæne bestowed that honour and earledome upon Archibald Dowglasie cousin to the said ladie Margaret: who being exiled, was here in England at the writing hereof. The earledome of Lennox, after the slaughter of Mattheu earle of Lennox (husband to this Margaret) which was in Sterling the fourth of September, in the yeare of our redemption 1571, but 1572 as hath Lelless, was inuested in Charles James the first king of Scotland, heire in blood to the said Mattheu earle of Lennox, father to Henrie lord Darneleite (that married the quæne) father to the said James the first. Whereupon the yong king, mindfull of the aduancement of his uncle Charles sonne to the said Margaret, did inuest the said Charles with the honour of the said earledome of Lennox, which Charles died in the life of his mother Margare-ret without heire male, by reason wherof the said earledome reuerted to the crowne.

But here leaving the title and succession of the earles of Lennox to an other place following (sith I am entered into the discourse of such of the earles & countesses of Lennox as be dead) I thinke it better in this place, than not at all, to mention the epitaph of Mattheu earle of Lennox slaine at Sterling (as is before touched) in the yeare of Christ 1571. For although the same matter would more aptlie haue bene placed before at the end of the historie of Scotland, written by Holinshed, or at the beginning of my continuance of the annales of that countrie, when I mention the death of the said earle: yet sith the note of that epitaph came not unto my hands, untill I had thus farre proceeded in the histo-rie; and the same also at that time passed the print (whereby I could not set it downe in due place) I will here (having so good occasion therfore) intreating of the toorne of his wife (whose charge also wanted not in erecting of this toorne of his slaine husband, and for that this doth also touch some part of his epitaph) insert the same in this place after this maner, as it is written upon the statelie toorne of the said Mattheu Lennox, and now standing in the chapell within Sterling castell, being as hereafter foloweth.

The epitaph of Mattheu earle of Lennox.

Lo here a prince and potentate, whose life to vnderstand,

Was godlie, iust, and fortunate, though from his natie land

His enemies thrice did him out thring, he thrice returnd againe,

Was lawfull tutor to the king, and regent did remaine:

Where he with rigor rebels rackt, the right for to defend,

Till enemies old through tyrans trackt, did worke his fatall end.

Lo thus respects the death no wight,

When God permits the time,

Yet shall the vengeance on them light that wrought that cursed crime.

Besides which also on the same toorne are these heroicall verses set downe, declaring his name, his descent, his marriage, his issue, his offices, and such other ther matters belonging vnto him, as followeth.

Behold herein interred is,
Matthew of Lennox earle, Who long of late in Britaine soile, did liue a pearlesse pearle.
And as he was of roiall bloud, by roiall progenie, From Stewards stocke of ancient time, princes of Albanie:
His fortune was euen so to match, with passing veruuous wight, Whose race deriued from famous kings, of wide renoumed might.
His mother queene of Scotland was,
and eldest daughter deare, Of Henrie seuenth English king, a princelie mirror cleare.
Hir father earle of Angus was, the ladie Margaret hight, The onelie heire of Angus lands, and all his fathers right.
Thus did king Brutus bloud conioine, for both by grace diuine Are come of Northwales princes hault, which were of Troians line.
And diuerse goodlie impes there were,
that issued from them twaine: Charls James now king, and * Charls the earle of them dooth still remaine, King Henrie father to this king, their first begotten sonne: Oh cruell fates! the which so soone, his vitall dired vnsporne, By whose deuise the grandfire came, lord regent in this land: And noblie bare the regall sword of iustice in his hand.
Whereby he did in tender age of the kings maiestie, This realme protect with fortitude, prudence and equitie.
But now dame fame with flickering wings withouten anie let,
Shall spread abroad this worthie man, and through the world him set.
And tearing time shall not consume, nor weare the same awaie, But with the worthiest reckned be, vntill the latter daie.
After which time, eternitie dooth triumph then by right: Where he with angels shall reioise, in Gods eternall sight.

Besides which English epistaph these verses were also composed by Buchanan vpon the same earle of Lennox, wherein is not onelie set downe (as before) the honourable birth of the man, but also some of the places of his education, with other things which right fortunatlie happened vnto him in this sort.

Thus setting end to the lines & deaths of this Spatthiew Steward earle of Lennox, of Margaret Deluglasse his wife, to their honourable epitaphs, and to their sumptuous sepulchres, we will come backe againe to such others, either generall or spectall, accidents as haue fallen in the kingdome of Scotland, and which will touch the vniuersall gouernement, or the particular occurrents as well of Scottish as of other forren affaires managed by them at home, or in other countreies, therewithall ioining the discourse of such things as haue bene performed by other nations in that kingdome. Amongst which accidents in Scotland this raretie happened, that the earle Spoton surrendered his pprotectorship or regentship of the king and kingdome of Scotland. Which I maie 10 worthilie count rare, sith men in so great authoritie of commanding all persons, can hardlie be brought to giue ouer such honour, and to yeld themselves to the commandement of others, because Qui primatus sui autoritatem perdit in despectionem et angustiam se mi-sit: qui autem locum suum sapienter custodit, se ac suos ad profectum dirigit. And Bias the philosopher knew, that it was a most hard thing of all other, and onelie sauon-ring of great magnanimitie and wisdom, Fortiter ferre mutationes rerum in deterum. But he being verie 20 wise, feared not the alteration of his estate, but rather desired to be rid thereof, considering the weigh-tinesse and danger which depended thereupon, and re-membryng that notable sayeng of Gregorie in his spozals, declaring the singular good of such, which doo thun the gouernement of temporall things, in these wordes. Quasi quodam iugo seruitutis premunt prospera dum appetuntur; premunt aduersa dum formidantur. At si quis se-mel dominationem desideriorum temporalium a collo mentis excuserit, quadam iam etiam uita libertate perfruitur, et dum 30 nullo desiderio sollicitatus afficitur, nullo aduersitatis errore co-arctatur.

This earle Spozton (I saie) surrendred his office (as before is touched) in the moneth of March, in this yeare of our Lord one thousand five hundred seuentie & seuen, at what time also Robert Botres esquier was then in Scotland for hir maiestie of England. Vpon the remouing of which erle Spozton there were no moze regents in that countreie, but the king took vpon him to rule the realme by him-40 selfe & by such curators as he shuld appoint therfore.
For the king now about the twelue yere of his age thought he might aswell take vpon him the gouernment of the countreie by himselfe, and such as he appointed at those yeares, as manie of his ancestors had done before in their yong yeares; notwithstanding the opinion of manie of the better sort of the presbiterie, which mainteins that he cannot absolute-lie rule, or perfectlie establish anie thing by the cu-stomes of their countreie, vntill he come to the age of 50 fine and twentie yeares. But we find in their olde hystories of Scotland, written euen by men of best iudgement; that James, the second of that name king of Scots, did in the fourtenth yeare of his age, in the twentith yeare of his reigne, and in the yeare of our Lord one thousand four hundred forty and foure, put Alexander Lennox, knight from his regentship, and took vpon himselfe the absolute gouernement of the kingdome, of whom thus writteth Lesleus. Gubernatoris cancellarijque conciliarij missi

After

After which, about five yeares following, the same James, to shew his absolute and sufficient gouernement, did in the yeare of Christ 1449, in the nineteenth yeare of his age, and the twelfth yeare of his gouernement create Alexander Seton lord Gourdon earle of Huntley, and George Leslie a baron earle of Rothesay. James the fourth of that name king of Scotland, being but sixtene yeares of age when he came to the crowne, in the yeare of Christ one thousand four hundred four score & eight, administered the realme by himselfe without any procurator, as I gather out of Lesleus. James the fifth the king of Scots, in the yeare of our Lord one thousand five hundred twentieth and eight, in the seventeenth yeare of his age, & about the fiftieth yeare of his gouernment, remoued the earle of Angus from the regentship, and tooke vpon himselfe the gouernment of the kingdome. And Marie the mother of the now liuing king of Scots, did in like sort in the yeare one thousand five hundred fiftie and two, in the tenth of hir age, and as much of hir gouernment of Scotland appoint procurators to gouerne the realme, whilst she remained in France with the French king hir husband. But enough of this, sith Lesleus in his 9. booke pag. 429, and also in his 10. booke pag. 517, hath liberallie argued on both parts, at what yeares the kings of Scotland may assume to themselves the gouernment of the kingdome, after that they haue attained to the crowne in those yeares, which are ouer tender and unfit to dispose of the sword and scepter. Wherefore to passe ouer the same, I thinke it not vniuersall in this place, sith we haue mentioned this Morton which was the last regent, gouernour or protector of the kingdome, to set downe a catalog of all such regents and gouernours of that realme, as haue come to my knowledge, after the same sort as I haue done in England at the end of the gouernment of the duke of Summerset, who was the last protector of that realme: into the discourse whereof I enter as followeth.

The protectors, gouernours, or regents of Scotland, during the kings minority or his insufficiencie of gouernement, or during his absence out of the realme.

Conanus.

Conanus was gouernour vnder Thereus about the yeare before the birth of Christ, one hundred thirtie and seven: for Thereus renouncing the kingdome and fleeing to Poyke, where in the end he died, this Conanus during the exile of this Thereus, was regent or gouernour, of whom writeth Lesleus lib. 2. pag. 89. Conanus qui rempublicam Therei iam exulantis loco optime administraret, interrex à nobilibus declaratur. Nam Thereo viuo nullum alium regem substituere vulerunt, quo mortuo, Iosina eius frater successus est.

Cadallus.

Cadallus liuing about the yeare before the birth of Christ, seuentie and nine, did pursue Gillus (the bastard of Cuenus) having slaine the sonne of Cuenus, and blurring the crowne, of whom thus writeth Lesleus lib. 6. pag. 92. Tandem auctore Cadallo viro fortissimo, qui interrex à regni nobilibus interea constitutus est, quidam in Hiberniam profugam assecuti, inita prius pugna capiunt, & statim capite plectuntur.

Argadus erle of Argile.

Argadus earle of Argile, when Conar who began his reigne in the yeare of Christ one hundred fortie and eight, was cast in prison for his euill life, was by the nobilitie chosen gouernour of Scotland, after which Ethodus the next king, whome this Argadus holpe vnto the crowne made him chiefe iustice of Scotland to him and his heires, which function at this date the earles of Argile doe inioice by inheritance.

Donald, Colollan, Morbach and Conrade were made gouernours of the kingdome, for thus writeth Lesleus lib. 4. pag. 198. Senectutis tandem tadio illius (which was Etheline who began his reigne about the yeare of Christ, seuen hundred thirtie and three) vires ita debilitate sunt, & cum regni oneri ferendo impar fuerit, quatuor sui regni regulos (in quibus præstans quædam sed fucata virtutis species eluxit) delegit, quibus singulis singulas prouincias decreuit; Donaldus Argadiam; Colano Atholiam; Mordaco Gallouidiam; & Conano Morauiam.

Donald, Colollan, Morbach, & Conrade.

William Fraiser bishop of S. Andrewes, &c: after the death of Alexander the third king of Scotland, which fell in the yeare of our Lord, one thousand two hundred four score and three, who died without issue, the nobilitie (because it was not knownen to whome the kingdome did appertene, sith there were manie which claimed the same, as Balioll, Bruce, Hastings, and others) agreed amongst themselves, and chose six regents or gouernours of the same, vntill a king were fullie known and established: the names of which six were these, William Fraiser bishop of saint Andrewes, Duncane earle of Fife, John Cumine earle of Buchquane, to whome the rule of the north parts were committed. The other three were Robert bishop of Glasgou, sir John Cumine, and James high steward of Scotland, who had the disposition of the south parts.

William Fraiser.

Hugh Cressingham an Englishman was made gouernour of Scotland by Edward the first, who going into France about the yeare of Christ one thousand two hundred ninetie and six, after that he had brought Scotland vnder his subiection, appointed the said Hugh (whom he had before made treasurer of Scotland) to haue the gouernment of that realme in his absence, whilst he was buised in the wars of France. But not long after, this Cressingham was slaine at Sterling by William Wallace (and such Scots as attempted by all the force they could to set themselves at libertie from the subiection of the English) in the ides of September, in the yeare of Christ, one thousand two hundred ninetie and seven, at what time also Andrew Purreie was slaine, whose sonne did certeine yeares after (as hath Buchanan) administer and gouerne Scotland for the king.

Hugh Cressingham.

Buchan. lib. 3.

William Wallace after manie worthy exploits done in the behalfe of his countrie against the English, was for the Scots chosen gouernour of the realme vnder John Balioll, when the king had forsaken the realme and was come into England, about the yeare of Christ, one thousand two hundred ninetie and six, who after that (as is before touched) did slea Cressingham the gouernour of Scotland vnder the king of England, which Wallace did after in the yeare of Christ one thousand two hundred nintie and eight renounce his office of gouernour, and was in the end for his rebellion against king Edward the first king of England, and absolute lord of Scotland, taken, brought to London, drawn, hanged and quartered, in the yeare of Christ one thousand three hundred and five.

William Wallace.

John Cumine, after that William Wallace had giuen ouer his office of gouernour, was chosen to be gouernour for the Scots, in purpose to trie with the Englishmen for their liberties, which being knownen to Edward the first king of England, he sent an armie into the countrie, and destroyed it. Whereupon John Cumine admitted Simon Fraiser seldow with him in the administration of the wars against the English, and discomfited the English in the pere of our Lord God one thousand three hundred and two. After which king Edward being againe a conqueror of the Scots, returned homewards, and left Dòmare de Valence his deputie in Scotland.

Dòmare de Valence or Aimer de Valence.

Dòmare de Valence or Aimer de Valence, uncle to king Edward the first king of England by the halfe blood, was about the yeare of our Lord one thousand three hundred and four, made gouernor of Scotland vnder Edward the first king of England, who before in the yeare one thousand three hundred & two, toke William Wallace and sent him to London to king Edward, to be dealt withall as you haue heard before. After which Robert Bruce being crowned king of Scotland, was on the nineteenth of June in the yeare of Christ one thousand three hundred and six, at Speken discomfited by the English armie, and put to flight by the said Dòmare de Valence, who after banished all those which ante waite toke part with king Robert Bruce. But in the end Robert Bruce recovering himselfe & moze aid, drave all the Englishmen out of Scotland, gouerning the kingdome all his life, by himselfe & his substitutes, as by that which followeth maie well appeare.

Thomas Randolph.

Thomas Randolph earle of Arrerte, much about the yeare of Christ one thousand three hundred and six and twentie, being about the 21 yeare of Robert Bruce, was made protector of the realme. For Robert Bruce being fallen into extreme sickness, whereby he could not weeld the scepter to gouerne as the state of that countrie required, committed the administration of the realme to erle Thomas Randolph, and to James Dowglaste knight, who ruled the same to their singular commendation, and the countries good about foure yeares, during the life of the said Robert Bruce, whose death happened in the yeare of Christ one thousand three hundred twentie and nine. After the death of king Robert, when Dauid his sonne came to the crowne, being but seven yeares old, this Randolph was againe appointed to haue the administration of the kingdome as regent of the same, during the kings minority and insufficiency of gouernement, who confirmed a new peace betwene England and Scotland. Shortly after which the gouernor died of poison at Newcastle, in the pere of our redemption one thousand three hundred thirtie and one, being about the second yeare of king Dauid, & was buried at Dunfermling, hauing had two sons, John erle of Arrerte, and Thomas, both being persons worthy of such a father.

Patrike Dunbar.

Patrike Dunbar earle of March was made regent after this sort. After the death of erle Thomas Randolph, there was an assemble of parliament of the three estates of the realme, in which in the said yeare of Christ one thousand three hundred thirtie and one, and the second yeare of the reigne of king Dauid, these two, Patrike earle of March and Dauid (whom Lesle calleth Donald) earle of Arrerte were chosen gouernors of the realme by common consent. Whereof the first had the charge of that part of the realme which lieth on the south side of the Frith, & the other was appointed to gouerne all that on the north: which Donald in the yeare of Christ one thousand three hundred thirtie and two was slaine sleeping in his bed at Duplin nere to the waier of Erne, by such as followed and toke part with Edward Balliol attaining the crowne, and expelling Dauid from the kingdome.

Andrew Murray.

Andrew Murray, a man of great power, and of no lesse possession, hauing performed manie exploits of warre for his countrie, was made gouernor after the death of the earle of Arrerte, and joined in that office with Patrike of Dunbar earle of March. Shortly after which this Andrew was taken prisoner at Rockborough, being yet in the end ransomed for a great summe of gold. After which he died of a vehement sickness, and was buried in Rose Parkie, in the yeare of Christ one thousand three hundred thirtie and eight.

Archibald Dowglaste, after the decease of Andrew Murray, was by one consent of the nobilitie chosen gouernor in the place of Andrew Murray, whilst king Edward did bessege Berwik, who raising a power of men entred England, and caused the king to remoue his siege of Berwik. Afterward this Dowglaste was slaine at the battell of Halidon hill, in the yeare of Christ one thousand three hundred thirtie and two (as some haue) but Hector Boetius and Buchanan refer it to the yeare of our Lord God one thousand three hundred thirtie and three, the nineteenth of Iulie.

Archibald Dowglaste.

Dauid Cumine was made protector in this sort. When that Edward the third king of England, in the yeare of Christ one thousand three hundred thirtie and six had entred Scotland with maine force by land and by sea; he afterwards hauing Edward Balliol the king of Scotland in his companie with 50000 men came by land to Glasgou: but perceiving no resistance against him, retired with Balliol into England, and left Dauid Cumine earle of Artholl gouernor in his come, to win such holds and strengths as were yet defended against him. Which Dauid toke on him to be gouernor in the name of Edward Plantagenet king of England, and of Edward Balliol king of Scots, seizing into his hands all the lands which pertained to Robert Stewart, so that at one time there was chopping and changing of gouernors by each part which became stronger.

Dauid Cumine.

Robert Stewart regent of Scotland possessed that place, at this time also when Dauid Cumine was gouernor for Edward Balliol; for this witness Lesleus li. 7. pa. 234. Verum ne patria gubernatoris imperio destituta, aduersariorum insidij pateret magis, Robertus Stuartus omnem regi curam in se transtulit, quoad Dauid ex Gallia rediret, ipse tunc regni gubernacula suscepturus. By which words appeareth, that as Dauid Cumine was gouernor for Edward Balliol gone into England, so this Robert Stewart toke vpon him the regentship for king Dauid Bruce fled into France: the which he the rather did, because he would incounter Dauid Cumine which had spoiled him of all his liuings and patrimonie. Which Robert being thus procurator of the kingdome, granted sundrie priuileges to the inhabitants of Bute & Arrane, as amongst other things, to be free from paying of tribute of corne and graine. For this Robert together with John Randolph earle of Arrerte, were by a counsell assembled at Edenborough by generall voices elected and confirmed to be gouernors of the realme, about the yeare of Christ one thousand three hundred thirtie and four, or one thousand three hundred thirtie and five.

Robert Stewart.

John Randolph earle of Arrerte protector.

Robert Stewart earle of Fife, second sonne to Robert Stewart the first king of Scotland (by the name of Stewart) and the second by the name of Robert, was (because his father became extreme old, and could not follow the affaires of the kingdome) made gouernor by the content of the realme during the life of his father, about the yeare of our Lord God one thousand three hundred foure score and nine, being about the nineteenth yeare of the reigne of the said Robert the second: which office this Robert continued during the life of his father, dieng in the yeare of Christ one thousand three hundred

Robert Stewart.

Arrane, but shortly after they falling out amongst themselves for the bestowing of benefices, the duke of Albanie was called out of France to performe that office.

John duke of Albanie.

John duke of Albanie being sent for out of France (where he accustomed to abide) to come into Scotland (to be tutor to the king and governor of the realme, as he which next of blood to the king, and nearest to the crowne) was by universall consent at saint Johns towne admitted to those offices accordinglie, having the same confirmed unto him by a parlement holden at Edinburgh in the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred and thirtene, and the first yeare of the young king James the first. Whereof intelligence being brought unto the duke, yet in France, he in the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred and fourtene, directeth dilatorie and excusing letters of his acceptance of that charge. At that time, but in the yere following, being the yeare of Christ, one thousand five hundred and fiftene, and in the third of James the first, on the seventeenth of Maye, he arrived at the towne of Aire in Scotland to execute his office of governor, who was honorablie interteined at sundrie places as he passed along by the sea coasts, before he came to Edinburgh. After which a parlement was made to be called at Edinburgh (being but the continuance of the former parlement, as my memorie serveth) in which this duke of Albanie was againe confirmed governor, the scepter and sword being delivered unto him, and an oath by him to the lords, and by the lords to him given, that each of them should be faithfull to each other, and euerie of them to their lord and king, &c. After this the duke of Albanie going into France in the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred and seuentene, as saith Lesleus, committeth the government of the kingdome in his absence to the archbishops of S. Andrews and Glasgow, and to the earles of Huntlye, Argyle, Angus, and Arrane. And least any euill might happen to the kings person in his absence, he appointed the king to be brought into the castle of Edinburgh, there to be committed to the earle marshall, and to the lords Eschwine, Bothwicke, and Ruthuene, whereof two at the least should alwaies be present with him. The duke having thus bene about some three yeares in France, returned into Scotland about the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred and twentie, remaining still governor: but in following time, which was the yere of Christ one thousand five hundred thirtie and foure, and about the twelfth yeare of the reigne of king James the first, the duke of Albanie left that office, and went againe into France.

Margaret the quene.

Margaret the quene, the mother of James the first, did (after the departure of the duke of Albanie into France, in the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred thirtie and foure, the six and twentieth of Julie) find meanes that the young king came from Sterling unto Edinburgh: three daies after which the quene took the whole government upon hir, and entred into the castle of Edinburgh with the king, making the lord Marwell protonot of Edinburgh. When the quene appointing a parlement to be held the february following, there were in the same parlement eight lords chosen to be of the kings private counsell, to take on them the government of the king and the realme, which were the archbishop of S. Andrews and Glasgow, the bishops of Aberdeen & Dunblane: the earles of Angus, Arrane and Lencour, to whom the quene was adioined as principall, without whose aduise nothing should be done. Which ordinance did not long hold, Archibald Dotooglas earle of Angus in the end fullie getting the whole government into his hands.

Archibald Dotooglas (after that the bishop of Dunbane was dead, and the quene gone into Sterling, leaving the king with the earle of Angus, in the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred thirtie and foure, being about the thirtieth of James the first) took the whole government upon him both of the king and kingdome, setting by, removing, and pulling downe that officer it best pleased him: who for the more declaration of his authoritie and government, made his uncle Archibald Dotooglas treasurer of the realme, and bestowed all benefices and offices by the aduise of his brother George Dotooglas and the earle of Lencour who assisted him. After which there was a divorce had betwene the quene and the earle, who falling in the kings disgrace in the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred thirtie and eight, and the sixteenth yeare of the same James the first, was attainted by parlement holden at Edinburgh in September, when the king had taken the absolute government into his hands in the seventeenth yeare of his age, and the said sixteenth yeare of his said government. Whereupon the yeare following, this Archibald came unto the king for to submit himselfe, but the king would not receiue him, by reason whereof he fled into England.

James earle of Arrane in the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred fourtie and two, when Marie (the daughter of James the first) being but seven daies old obtained the kingdome, was by authoritie of the nobilitie proclaimed regent and protector of Scotland, notwithstanding all that David Beton, fauor of the French causes had without all reason usurped the government, under the pretense of a devised will and testament of James the first, in which testament he was appointed governor. This earle thus made protector, appointed by the old quenes consent a governor to the person of the young queen, which was the lord Levingstone capitaine of Aithy quo. This protector in the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred fortie and foure, being the second yere of queen Marie, was by the French king made knight of the order of saint Michaele. About eight yeares after which, that is in the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred fiftie and three, being about the twelfth yeare of queen Marie, this earle was inforced to leaue his office of governor, and the quene took the same into hir hands, appointing procurators to rule the same under hir: whereupon the governor in the yeare following, being one thousand five hundred fiftie & foure, was by the French king made duke of Chatelaerault. The procurators which were appointed for and by queen Marie, were (as hath Lesleus) Henrie king of France, Charles cardinal of Lozeine and the duke of Guise his brother, touching whom thus writteth the same Lesleus in these words: Hos (which was hir curators) sibi in Gallia delegerat regina nostra (being Marie the quene of Scots) maximis suavis, Henricum regem Francie, Carolum cardinalem Lotharingum, ac ducem Guisum eius fratrem, qui totam regni nostri molem regine matri procurandam transulerunt: &c. This duke had issue James Hamilton earle of Arrane after lunatike, and one David Hamilton.

Marie descended of the house of Guise, the dowager of Scotland, as widow to James the first, and mother to the young quene Marie, was in the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred fiftie and foure, being the twelfth yeare both of the age and reigne of the same quene Marie, made regent of Scotland under hir daughter the same young quene, which office

Marie dowager of Scotland.

Lesleus lib. 1. pag. 517.

office this regent toke vpon his hauing the same confirmed by parlement, continuing in that place about six yeares, & died in the castle of Edenburgh, in the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred and thre score, being vpon the point of the eighteenth yeare of quene Marie, whose bodie (as hath Lesleus) was after caried into France, for thus he writeth: Fuit autem corpus in Galliam postea transuectum, primum ad monasterium Feckamense, quod in Normania est, deinde ad cœnobium S. Petri Rhemis in Campania, cui soror ipsius piè tunc præerat, delatum, honorificè condebatur.

James Stewart bastard sonne to king James the first king of Scots, and bafe brother to Marie quene of Scots now liuing and imprisoned, being prioz of saint Andriew and earle of Mar, was in the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred thre score and two, being about the twentieth yeare of the reigne of the same quene Marie, made earle of Arrere. About five yeares following, after that the nobilitie had conspired against quene Marie, toke hir, committed hir to prison, depose hir, and vpon the same (on the nineteenth daie of Iulie in the yeare a thousand five hundred thre score and seven, being the five & twentieth yeare of the reigne of that quene) advanced hir sonne Charles James Stewart (being then about a yeare old) to the kingdome, by the name of James the first: this James earle of Arrere, was made regent and gouernoz of the young king James the first, and of the kingdome: who vpon the office receiued, did by parlement abolish the popes authoritie and doctrine in Scotland: continuing that office of regent vntill his death, falling about the time of thre yeares after. For in the time of Christ one thousand five hundred thre score and ten, being in the third yeare of the reigne of James the first, this regent as he was riding through Lithquo, was shot at with an harquebus by one James Hamilton, and so wounded, that he died of the hurt the next daie following, hauing before in that yeare, in which he was created earle of Arrere, married Agnes Keith daughter to the earle Marthall.

Mattheu earle of Lenex, being sent for out of England, where he had before long remained, was after the death of the earle of Arrere, in the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred thre score and ten, being in the third yeare of the reigne of James the first, made lord lieutenant or protector of Scotland, in a convention of the lords of Sterling. After which in August following, there was another convention at Edenburgh, where by the consent of the thre estates of the realme, the said earle was made regent of Scotland, at what time the earle of Huntley toke vpon him to be lord lieutenant of Scotland: for Marie quene of Scots remaining then vnder custodie in England, which Huntley in hir name summoned a parlement at Lithquo the 21 daie of September, wherevnto the earle of Lenex was summoned: to incounter which, the earle of Lenex caused a parlement likewise to be summoned in the kings name at the same place, wherunto the earle of Huntley was warned at the same daie. But the earle of Huntley coming no neuer at that time than Brechin, it was ordered by the regent Lenex and the nobilitie, to pursue him: wherevpon ensued great warres betwene the nobilitie of Scotland diuided into factions, some taking part with the depose quene Marie, and other with the young king in possession. During which turmoiles and wars, this earle of Lenex hauing bin regent about a yeare and more, was wounded at Sterling with a pistoll by capteine Calder, whereof he shortly after died, in the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred thre score and eleven, being about the fourth yeare of James the first.

John Arskine earle of Mar was made regent after the death of the earle Lenex, as made appeare by that which I haue before set downe in the continuance of the annals of Scotland, after whose succeeded the earle Morton, of whom I haue a little before spoken, and of whom we will more intreat hereafter, when we come to speake of his beheading, in the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred fourescore and one, falling about the fourteenth yeare of James the first, after that the said earle had continued that office about five yeares. For being advanced to that place, about the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred thre score and twelue, he continued in the same, vntill he surrendered it, in the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred thre score and seuentene, as is before touched. Thus setting end to the discourse of the protectors of Scotland, let vs descend to other matters which haue succeeded.

Going therefore forward with that yeare one thousand five hundred thre score and seuentene, we saie that much about the time in which the earle Morton gaue ouer his regentship, that the lord Glames, who was then in office of the chancelorship, was trecherously slaine by his enemies at Sterling, with a shot of purpose discharged against him, as he was coming out of Sterling castell, & going to his owne lodging from the councill or parlement. Whereby it seemeth that this murdering by sudden shot began now to be a common thing: for there were thre great persons in short time dispatched after that sort, which were the earles of Arrere and Lenex regents, & this lord Glames chancelor. After the death of which lord Glames, the earle of Atholl was advanced to that place, and invested with the title of lord chancelor of Scotland. Wherefore, hauing so good occasion therefore at this time by talking of this earle of Atholl thus made lord chancelor to treat of that office: I thinke it not inconuenient in this place, nor disagreeable to the nature of the matter which I haue in hand, somewhat by waie of digression, to discourse of the originall of this office in Scotland, which I will doe in few words.

This officer the chancelor had his first originall in Scotland by Malcolm the second of that name king of Scots, who beginning his reigne in the yeare of our redemption one thousand and ten, and gouerning thirtie yeares, departed the world in the yeare of Christ one thousand and fortie. This man, during the time of his gouernment, ordeining manie necessarie laws for the better rule of his countrie, and for the benefit of the crowne, did also first ordeine the honorable officers of the kingdome, as chancelor, constable, marthall, chamberleine, and others, as appeareth by Lesleus in his historie of Scotland in these words: Felicitè rempublicam haud paucos annos administravit (king Malcolm) multis & egregijs operibus illustris: interque cetera municipalium legum volumen condidit, quas nostrates exinde in iudicijs ferendis seruauerunt, nihil pene immutatas, regionum magistratuum iudiciumque, quos licet mundijs, magisque Latine vocare possunt, vulgò tamen cancellarium, constabilem, mariscallum, camerarium, iusticiariumque vocitant, & qui a secretis, a thesauris, a cubiculo, a chartophylaceo essent: cunctorumque ministrorum aula annua salaria, vt nostris diebus penduntur, quantumque regijs pro diplomatis, ac ceteris literis, libellionibus, tabularijs, lectoribusque soluendum foret, instituit. This officer being in Scotland before the time of Edward the confessor, seemeth also to me conuenient.

ueritie to proue, that the same officer was in England before the time of the same king, sith it appeareth, that the Scots for the most part haue alwaies taken their maner of gouernement, lawes, and customs from vs, as will be I doubt not sufficientlie proued, although it maie be that some will affirme that they might haue this officer from the Frenchmen & Romans as other nations had : which as I do not suppose, because the Romans had but little dwings amongst them, for as they neuer vsed anie such officer in this land whilste they gouerned here (for anie thing that I can yet learne) so it maie be, (because they will not seeme to haue borrowed anie order of their gouernement from vs) that they will suppose that they had the first ground of this officer from the French, with whome they haue alwaies bene in league euer since the time of their king Achaius the first, who (beginning his reigne in the yeare of Christ seven hundred fourescore and eight) did knit a perpetuall league with Charles the great. But leauing this, we saie (more particularlie treating of Scotland) that much about this time, John Lesle bishop of Rosse (who had some yeares before bene some certeine time imprisoned in the Tower of London in England, and had travelled to Rome about the affaires of the imprisoned quene of Scotland, where he labored to procure such aid for hir, as the princes which fauored hir faction would yeld) did depart from Rome, and went from the pope to Randulph, as the second of that name now emperoz. Which said Lesle, taking his iourneie out of Italie, passed through the frontier towne of Germanie, and was staied at Platzenburgh, otherwisse called Palatinopolis, by George duke of Bawier, countie Palatine of Rhene, and earle of Heldegens; in which citie, his coffers and other things were rifled and searched: at what time there were manie writings found, and amongst others certeine papers, in which did appeare that friends the quene of Scots had of all the parts of Europe, what enemies, and what neutrals: with letters and other instructions of Philip king of Spaine.

All which notwithstanding (though they gaue the said George occasion to mistrust Lesle, as an enemy to his religion) this bishop of Rosse was afterward dismissed, because he was furnished with the emperors passport, or safeconduct to come vnto him. Wherefore the duke of Bawier for his better discharge, and to manifest to the world that they did nothing but that, which both the present estate of these troublesome times, and the dutie of a religious prince required, did honorablie dismiss the said Lesle, bearing all his charges, restoring all his goods, & conuicteng him out of his dominions with a goodlie companie of horsemen, after that he had caused the said bishop of Rosse to leaue a testimoniall writing in the Latine tongue vnder his owne hand, to shew that no iniurie was done to the said bishop, in that his detaining and search for those causes; & that the bishop should not anie waie seeke anie reuenge thereof: the copie of which writing (as I receiued the same) I haue faithfully and verbatim set downe in this sort.

The testimoniall left by the bishop

Os Iohannes Lesleus, Dei gratia, episcopus Rossensis, & administrator Morauia, &c: testamur hoc scripto palam & apud omnes hoc inspecturos, aut lecturos. Cum in hisce periculosis & motuum plenissimis temporibus omnibus sacri imperij principibus & magistratibus prospectio incumbat, ne imperium aut eius membra aliquid detrimenti accipiant, neque per prætereuntes & redeuntes ex externis nationibus, calidas negationes, ad turbandum pacem publicam, aut noxias dissensiones sub quouis prætextu tractari, strui aut seminari inter ordines & membra imperij sinant aut patiantur; præcipue cum nunc exempla in vicinis locis extant, quam facile aliquid strui & seminari possit. Ita factum est, vt illustrissimus princeps Georgius, Iohannes comes Palatinus Rheni, dux Bauaria, comesque Veldentzia, &c: motus præcedentibus & alijs rationibus, in absentia, per suos capitaneos & ministros, in suo territorio Lutzelsteinensi, & vrbe Palatinopoli, nos cum nostris retineri mandauerit. Quam causam & mandatum retentionis imperatori, antequam exqueretur, significauit. Post factam retentionem, celsitudo eius certior facta de literis imperatoris nobis communicatis de Spira, vbi mandatum dederat, protestatione ibi aliqua habita, festinanter huc apulit: præsertim etiam simul cum literis imperatoris, aliquarum copiarum instructionis & memorialium eius celsitudini missæ fuerat, vnde aucta suspicio, aliquid nos ad extirpandam religionem tentare: & cum mentio aliqua extirpandæ religionis hisce verbis facta fuerit, nimirum, vt extirpata hæresis, religio reuiuiscat, & simul cum procuracione Scotticorum monasteriorum, quorum Palatini aliquot possident, aliquid moturos in Germania putauerit, præsertim cum plurimos catholicæ religionis principes & episcopos in itinere cum literis credentalibus a papa salutauerimus, & inuiferimus. Ad quam suspicionem amouendam & purificandam, cum celsitudo eius aduenit, lectione aliquarum copiarum conati sumus celsitudini eius satisfacere. Etsi tamen aliquid scrupuli de extirpanda religione ac opinio de aliquibus negotijs quæ vigerem remaneret, quæ pacem publicam tam in religione, quam politicis perturbare, & suspicionem principibus Augustanæ confessionis mouere, non minus quam ipsius celsitudini possent. Nihilominus celsitudo eius, magis alijs rationibus, quam præcedentibus suspicionibus imminentium periculorum non diutius nos detenturos concludit. Ea tamen conditione, vt promitteremus nos contra patriam in causa religionis per viam armorum, aut structione dissensionum, aliquid nunquam tentaturos, sicut & alibi: sed quod exhortationibus pijs & doctrina facere possimus, liberam relinquere conscientiam. Secundò, quod polliceamur more solito, pro nostro, nostrarumque familiarum nomine, neque per nos neque per alios, vlla via & ratione quæ nominari possit, illam detentionem vindictam fore. Quare consideratione habita periculorum & motuum, quæ passim (potissimum verò in locis vicinis) cernuntur, sacro imperio, optima ratione metuendum & vigilandum, maxime verò in extremis imperij limitibus & terminis. Idcirco sanctè pollicemur, (decreto Constantiensis concilij, quo diuersis à Romana religione hominibus fidem datam seruandam haud esse, sancitum fuisse dicitur, hoc ipso scripto & optimo modo renuntiantes) nos nostro, nostrarumque familiarum nomine, iam neque per nos, neque per alios vlla vi, vel ratione, recta aut obliqua, quæ eius celsitudinem, aut eius famulos aut subditos &

Iohannes Lesleus episcopus Rossensis & administrator ecclesie Morauensis.

This Lesle being yet liuing, and (as I haue said) in great credit in France, possessing the place of the chancelloz of Lions, is descended of an ancient familie, as one whose ancestors and name hath both intioied honorable titles in descent, and great places of gouernement in the common-wealth of Scotland. For when Edgar the sonne of Edward the outlaw and kinsman to Edward the Confessor king of England was vered with vnjust war, first by Harold king of England the son of Godwine, & then by the Norman bassard surnamed the Conqueror, which surnamed Harold obtained the crowne of England; Edgar did priuillie take shipping with his mother Agatha, and his two sisters, to the end, that being now out of all hope euer to obtaine the kingdom of England, they might direct their course and saile againe into Hungarie, from whence they came. But it happened by diuine prouidence, that being on the sea, they were grieuouslie molested with vehement winds, which forcible made them forsake their appointed course, and draue them into the mouth of the riuer of Forth or Frith, whose landing place is yet to be seene, & at this daie called S. Margarets haven (after the name of hir which was sister to this Edgar & called Margaret) whome Malcolme king of Scots (for the rare parts both of bodie & mind wherewith she was wonderfully indued) did after take to wife, & solemnlie crowned to the great comfort of the whole kingdome. Upon which deed William the Conqueror being more grieuouslie moued than he was before, banished all the friends of Edgar out of England. By occasion whereof, Lindsey, Waus, Ramseie, Louell, and diuerse other men of great nobilitie came then first into Scotland to craue aid of king Malcolme; which persons being liberallie indued with rich possessions by the same Malcolme; their posteritie do at this daie in our age flourish with great honor. Besides which also, at this time there came out of Hungarie with Agatha before touched diuerse other persons of account, as Crighton, Forzingham, Giffert, Panlis, Borthike, and others; amongst whome Bartholomew Lesle descended of noble parentage, and of great valor of mind, did with the rest appeare verie famous, whose sharpe wit, and excellencie of knowledge (ioined with a sound and strong bodie) when Malcolme the king of Scots did behold, he vsed his helpe in the defense of the castell of Edinburgh, and in all other weightie affaires which concerned the warres.

Out of this familie of the Lesles haue sprung and flourished manie worthy persons, ballantlie resisting and subduing their enemies. And amongst those, one Walter Lesle earle of Rosse, who afterward purchased such singular commendation for valor and wisdom shewed in manie battels of the emperor Lewis the second, & Charles the fourth, against the Saracens, & (one of their owne name notwithstanding) a bishop of Rosse in his bishopric of Scotland (saith) a quodam animi generoso impetu, quo hostes frangere, & sub iugum fortiter mittere solebat, generosi equitis cognomentum sit consecutus: eiusdem stirpis comes Rothefius, multi que alij barones & equites Leslei cognominati (quos Malcolmus primum, ac alij deinde reges multis amplisque agris, in Fife, Augustia, Gourea, & Garcocha, aliisque prouincijs munifice cumulabant) magnæ hodie nobilitatis virtutisque commendatione in Scotia vigent. Of whose line and name at this daie (as is before said) continuing in great honor, the earle of Rosse now liuing called Lesle dwelleth in Fife, and married the daughter of the earle of Galloway or Galloway, the same earle of Rosse being a person no lesse wise and honorable, than descended of ancient and honorable ancestors. But leauing that familie, let vs returne from whence we haue digressed.

The bishop of Rosse being departed from the duke of Banter (as before you haue heard) in the yeare following, which was the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred thre score and nineteene, Amies Stewart the lord of Obignie in France, being of the house of the Stewards, and sonne to John the eldest brother of Matthew Leneur, some time regent of Scotland, buried at Sterling, as is before touched, did come into Scotland, was by the king most honorablie receiued, and advanced to further honor. For the king taking from Robert Stewart (whom the last yeare he had created earle of Leneur) the title of that earldome of Leneur, he now inuested this lord of Obignie with the same, and created him earle of Leneur, thereby more firmelie to bind the lord of Obignie in France to be faithfull vnto him in Scotland. And least he should seeme by taking the earldome from Robert Stewart to haue wronged him, the king for recompense thereof, bestowed vpon the said Robert Stewart as honorable a title and earldome as the same was, for he inuested the same Robert with the earldome of March. Not long after which the king erecting the same earldome of Leneur vnto a dukedome, he did bestow that honor of duke vpon the said lord of Obignie, & created him duke of Leneur, which title at this daie, his sonne being a towardlie young gentleman with most honorable possesse, he being the onlie person in that countrie which doth in this our age intioie that title of duke, being such an honor as was but latelie begun amongst them, and neuer verie plentifull in that region: for the same hath not yet as I for this present suppose noished at anie one time (when that title was rifest amongst them) these persons adorned with that stile. Now touching the matter of their first creation and continuance, I thinke it not vnfit to saie somewhat in this place.

The first creation of dukes in that countrie was vsed by Robert the third of that name, whose right name being John, was after turned vnto Robert, for doubt of euill successe to grow to the kingdome by a gouernor so called. For thus write the Scots as Lesleus hath deliuered with these speeches: Verum quum ipsi nobiles arbitrarerunt nomini inesse nescio quid ominis infausti, quod reges Francie & Anglie, hoc nomine consignati, bello prehenderetur, mutato nomine Robertum vt patrem eum appellari decreuerunt. Quæ illorum siue in nominis obseruatione superstitio, siue in regis conseruatione diligentia, maioris mali regi iam impendentes augurium quadam mihi videtur. Nam non multo post ex equo illi decidenti, omnia membra ita confusa fuerunt, vt (quod regnandi molestias ac labores nullo modo poterat pati) Roberti comiti Fifensi fratri suo regni gubernatione dedere cogeretur. Which John as before is said, hauing now obtained a new name, was the first which brought a new title of honor into his kingdome: for he created David his eldest sonne duke of Rothseie, and his brother Robert (whom he had made protector of the kingdome) duke of Albany, as is set downe by the same Lesleus in these words;

The lord of Obignie made earle of Leneur.

Robert Stewart made earle of March.

The first creation of dukes in Scotland.

Lesleus lib. 7. pag. 264.

To which king John of England and France, he might also haue added one of his own countrie of Scotland John Balliol the king, who was as unfortunate in his gouernment as anie of the other.

Words: Tertio plus minus anno (which was about the yeare of our redemption one thousand three hundred foure score and thirtene) concilio ex omni ordinum genere Perthi habito, post alias res pro regni comodo sapienter actas, rex Dauidem filium suum titulo ducis Rothsaix, & Robertum fratrem suum quem regno administrando prefecerat, ducis Albanij honore ornat: qui duo primi fuerunt in Scotia his titulis illustrati. Thus much he, proving that it is not about one hundred foure score and thirtene yeares since that title came first into Scotland. Wherby it aperech that England since the conquest having dukes erected by king Edward the third, who in the yeare of Christ one thousand three hundred thirtie & seven, made his eldest sonne duke of Cornwall, hath had dukes about two hundred fortie & nine yeres past, being fiftie and six yere before they had any in Scotland. And as those two before named were the first which were invested with the honor of duke in Scotland, so after the death of the same king which fell in the yeare of Christ one thousand foure hundred and six, in the Interregnum or vacancie of the kingdome (which continued eightene yeares from the said yere of Christ one thousand foure hundred and six, untill the yeare of Christ one thousand foure hundred twentie and foure) in which James the first having bene trained by in England obtained the crowne, and under the protection of Mor-dache (the sonne of the foresaid Robert the first duke of Albanie) to whom the government of the realme of Scotland was committed after the death of the said Robert the third.

Archibald Dowglas was the first Scot which passing the seas, & serving a strange prince, intitled ante such title of duke in ante foreign nation. For the Scots going then to aid the French against the English, the French king to honour the Scots and to bind them to be more faithful unto him, created John Stewart earle of Buquaine constable of France, & advanced the said Archibald Dowglas to the honor of the dukedome of Arnone: but he did not long intitle that great title, being shortly after slaine at the battell of Verneuil, in the yere of Christ one thousand foure hundred twentie and foure. In treating of which battell Buchanan, whose name may rightlie be deduced from Bucca vana, beyond all modestie and course of reason forgetting his calling, his learning and humanitie, hath spued out all his malice against the English nation, whereof I have treated in my former additions to the historie of Scotland. Thus having somewhat digressed from the matter of later yeares, wherewith I ought to have furnished my imperfect continuances of the annals of Scotland, I will returne to the lord of Obegnie, who was at this time created duke of Lennox, and who occasioned me to make this discourse. Wherefore I will here set downe what Lesseus hath written of the first originall of that house in France, and of this duke of Lennox thus by the king netolice as before said created, the words of which Lesseus bishop of Ross be these: Nouam quoque Scotorum equitum turmam Carolus 6 (king of France, which had the warres against the king of England, when the Scots were thus advanced in the dominions of France, being meane betwene the said yeares of Christ one thousand foure hundred and six, and one thousand foure hundred twentie and foure) paulo ante conscripsit, quæ vulgò Scotorum armorum cohors dicebatur. Huius primus dux Robertus Stuartus ex Lenoxij comitis familia ortus, domino de Aubigne multisque alijs terris, muneribus, honoribus, & balcaijs communi populi sermone dictis, a rege insignitus est. Quæ omnia a Scotis eiusdem cognominis & prolapsa continuata, successio-nis serie per Barnardum nimirum celebrem militiæ ducem, deinde per Robertum, denique Iohannem Stuartum comitis Lenoxij fratrem iam diu possessa, præclaræ nobilitatis ac indolis iuuenis, Iohannis filius non paruum suorum virtutis speciem de se excitans, etiam nunc hodie obtinet. Thus much Lesse. Beside which that Lesseus hath set downe of the first lord of Obegnie in France, Pankus Iouius in his booke of Empresse written in Italian, hath not forgotten to speake somewhat of him, where he setteth downe the devise of his ensignes or armes in this sort translated by me into English.

There was (saith Iouius) amongst the French, men a man of knowne vertue or prowesse, & most famous capteine called Heberard Stewart (borne of the blond rofall of Scotland) being honored with the title of monsieur de Obegnie, who being of kindred to James the fourth of that name, did beare for his devise or ensigne, a field siluer, a ramping lion gettoles, with a number of buckles thereabout; the which rote armour he did weare upon his upper garment, and likewise beare in his standard, with this posse, Distantia iungit: signifying thereby, that he was the mean or buckle to hold and knit together the king of Scots and the French king, with a just counterpoise against the force of the king of England, naturall enemy to Scotland and France. Thus much Iouius, & thus much of the duke of Lennox lord of Obegnie in France. After which, sith I am now in discourting of dukes of that countrie, and have shewed when the first duke was made in Scotland, and who they were; I thinke it not vnfit for this place, to set downe a catalog of all such dukes of Scotland as haue come vnto my knowledge by search of histories, since the creation of the same first dukes, in the yeare of Christ one thousand foure hundred and eightene; which I will not refuse to do in this place, following the same course which I haue observed before in the historie of England, where I haue set downe all the dukes, since the first creation of any duke in that countrie. Wherefore thus I enter into my dukes of Scotland.

A catalog of all the dukes of Scotland by creation or descent.

David Stewart (eldest son of John Stewart earle of Carricke, after called Robert the third, and leaving the name of John when he came to the crowne of Scotland) was (by parlement, about the yeare of Christ one thousand three hundred foure score and eightene, being the eight yeare of Robert the third) made duke of Rothsay, when he was about eighteares yeares of age, or rather twentie, as by all accounts it must be, if that be true that he was borne the two and twentieth date of October one thousand three hundred three score and eightene, made duke in the yeare one thousand three hundred fourescore & eightene, as some haue. But Lesseus (as before) referreth this as I by all circumstances doe gather, to the yeare of Christ one thousand three hundred foure score & thirtene. He married Margerite the daughter of Archibald earle Dowglas, about the yeare of Christ one thousand foure hundred, being the tenth of Robert the second.

Robert Stewart second son to Robert the second king of Scots, by Elisabeth daughter of Moray his wife, being by his father created earle of Fife and Menteth, was in the yeare of Christ one thousand three hundred fourescore and eightene, and the eight yeare of the government of Robert the second, advanced nanced to the title and honoz of the dukedome of Albanie : this Robert and the other David as I haue before noted, being the first dukes that euer were in Scotland. This man being gouernoz of Scotland in the yeare of Christ one thousand foure hundred and one, falling in the yeare of the reigne of Robert the third, did apprehend David the duke of Rothesie, and committed him to streit prisonment in Frankeland, where in the end he died by extreme famine, whose want of food was such, that he was faine to gnaw his owne fingers : of this Robert is more spoken in my protectozs of Scotland.

Murdacke called duke, was also earle of Fife, eldest sonne to this Robert duke of Albanie, was as is most likelie duke of Albanie after his father, who being gouernoz of Scotland, occasioned me to intreat more of him in that place.

Alexander Steward the second sonne of James the second, was by his father aduanced to the dukedome of Albanie, who being verie young at the time of his fathers death, which happened in the yeare of Christ one thousand foure hundred & threescore, was with his brother John earle of Mar, committed to the custodie of Marie their mother. After which in the yeare of Christ one thousand foure hundred threescore and thre, being the third yeare of James the third, he was taken on the sea by the Englishmen in the moneth of June, as he returned from his grandfather the duke of Guelderland, but was after restored home by the meanes of James Benedicte bishop of saint Andrews. About sixtene yeares following, in the yeare of Christ one thousand foure hundred threescore and ninetene, falling in the sixteenth yeare of James the third, this duke was committed prisoner to the castell of Edinburgh, out of which he brake and escaped to Dunbar, from whence being well furnished, he sailed into France where he was honorablie receiued, and there married the daughter and heire of the earle of Bononie, who shortly after dicng, and the duke perceiving himselfe not to be so well bled as he was before, came into England & was by king Edward the fourth louingly accepted; who granted aid to this duke. Whereupon he in the yeare of Christ one thousand foure hundred fourescore and two, did enter Scotland with a great power & spoiled the countrie, comming (without ante resistance in the yeare of Christ one thousand foure hundred fourescore and two, being the two and twentieth yeare of James the third) as far as Radstrag, or Kallstrig, where he pitched his campe: which being knowne, he was by mediation of the nobilitie admitted home to his countrie, being further preferred to the earldomes of March and Mar, and proclaimed generall lieutenant of the king; by meanes whereof, he gouerned the whole realme, the king being now in prison. After which, this duke letteth the king at libertie through the persuasions of the quene, without knowlege thereof giuen to the other of the nobilitie: whereby new turmoiles did arise amongst the people. Then in the yeare of Christ one thousand foure hundred fourescore and two, and the thre and twentieth yeare of James the third, this duke hauing intelligence that there was poison prepared to be giuen to him in drinke in the kings chamber, whereby he stood in feare of his life, did forsake the court and fled to Dunbar: at what time also the king for his owne safetie, got him vnto the castell of Edinburgh: whereupon the earle of Angus and Buccoquaine forsaking the king, took part with the duke.

After which the duke being summoned as some haue (or being besieged in the castle of Dunbar as other haue) fled into England. But Lesleus saith that he took a little bote and so escaped into France, where he was honorablie intertained by Charles king of that realme; and where the Frenchmen for his singularitie in feats of armes, termed him the father of chivalrie; thus writeth Lesleus. But others (deliuering this matter in other forme) saie that after his flight from Dunbar, he passed into England, gathered power, returned into Scotland, did invade the kingdome, & was put to flight: whereupon growing in disgrace with the king of England, he then fled into France. And then after, the same Lesleus saith: Parisijs dum singulare certamen Aurelianensis dux cum aliquo equite inuict astans, particula cuiusdam hastæ traicitur, breuique post moritur, about the yere of Christ one thousand foure hundred eightie thre. He left two sonnes behind him, John duke of Albanie gouernoz of Scotland during the minority of James the fourth, and one other Alexander, whom he had by his first wife in Scotland the daughter of the earle of Orkadie, which Alexander was after bishop of Morue, and abbat of Scone.

John Steward duke of Albanie, sonne to the foresaid Alexander duke of Albanie, did after the death of his father obtaine that dukedome, in the yeare of Christ one thousand foure hundred eightie thre: of this man I haue made a more large discourse in the gouernozs of Scotland, wherunto I refer thee; and therefore omit to talke anie further of him in this place.

James Steward (eldest sonne to James the third) being duke of Rothesie, is by some termed prince of Rothesie, was borne in the yeare of Christ one thousand foure hundred seuentie and two on the tenth daie of March, being about the twelue yeare of the reigne of his father James the third. This duke in the yeare of Christ one thousand foure hundred eightie and eight, in the nine and twentieth yeare of his father, and the sixteenth of his age, was by the nobilitie rebelling against his father made capitaine or leader of those rebels, who at that time at Banocksburne two miles from Sterling, incountring with the king his father, did there slea him; whereupon this James duke of Rothesie was presentlie made king by the name of James the fourth.

Alexander Steward the second, sonne to James the third, king of Scotland, and brother to James the fourth, was duke of Rothesie: for thus writeth Lesleus li. 8. pag. 331. In studium incubuit rex (which was James the fourth then king, in the yeare of Christ one thousand foure hundred eightie and nine) sedulo, vt Alexander dux Rothosiæ & Iohannes comes Marriæ sui fratres tenelli adhuc liberali educatione diligentissime imbuerentur, tantoque sumptu pro ratione patrimonij, quod singulis pater reliquerat satis amplum, magnifice alerentur. He died the sixteenth kalends of Januarie, in the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred and sixtene at Sterling.

Henrie Steward lord Dorneleie the eldest sonne to Mattheu Steward erle of Lenear, was brought vp in England, a goodlie and beautifull personage, being to be married to Marie the quene of Scots, was after his comming into Scotland made earle of Rosse, in the yere of Christ one thousand five hundred threescore and five by the same quene, about the thre and twentieth yeare of his reigne: shortly after which he was in the Iulie following created duke of Albanie; and on saturday the eight and twentieth day of the same moneth before the marriage, proclaimed king by the quenes commandement, at the market crosse of Edinburgh, being married to the same Marie on the nine and twentieth daie of the same moneth, in the chapel at Holie rood house, at five of the clocke in the morning: which honoz he did not long insoie. For in the tenth of Februarie, in the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred threescore and six (what by the malice of some of the nobilitie, and false persuasion of others, he was led to enter into those actions, which in the end were his owne overthrow, and that by such as moued him thereunto) he was miserablelaine in a house within the towne, nere to kirke a field.

Amies Steward lord of Obignete in France, sonne to John Steward brother to Matthew Steward earle of Leneur, being first by James the first of that name made earle of Leneur, was after by the same king made duke of Leneur; who being dead, hath left a yong sonne behind him, a gentleman of great hope, at this date liuing, inioieng the title of his father, and called duke of Leneur. Thus hauing set downe all the dukes which haue bene in Scotland, we wil descend to such Scots as haue inioied that title in a forren nation.

Lodowike Steward
duke of Le-neur.

That diuers of the Scots haue obtened the title and honor of dukes in forren countries.

As it is honorabie to anie man to be aduanced vnto anie title of honour in his owne countrie, either for desert or fauor; whereof yet parcialitie maie most com-monlie be the fortherer: so is it far more honorabie and remoued from all suspition of vnderferued fauor, to be inuested with anie title of dignitie for anie cause in a forren countrie; because princes (whose hands are mostlie opened to enrich their subiects, in whose faithfull hearts their safetie is principallie inclosed) do not commonlie without singular desert aduance strangers to them by birth in an other nation, & not their native subiects, for that they are people, to whom without an especiall trall anie prince is not to commit anie portion of his kingdome, and much lesse anie part of his person. Wherefore the same being an argument of worthie desert, either for assured fidelitie to the person of such prince, or for the valour of seruice of the aduanced, when anie one is aduanced with anie such title of honor, I thinke it not vnsitt in this place to obscure the glozie of the Scots (who might impute the same to be malicious-lie done by me) and to omit such of their nation as haue inioied the title of dukes in a forren countrie, especiallie being now in hand with all the dukes of Scotland.

And although the number of such dukes be small, as not exceeding the figure of foure, and therefore in some mens minds might well enough be passed ouer in silence: yet carrieng a contrarie mind, in that I would not anie waie pretermitt what they iustlie deserue, I will faithfullie set downe what I find recoz-ded touching the same after this maner.

Archibald
Dowglas
duke of Tour-
aine.

Archibald Dowglas was created duke of Touraine in France in this sort. In the yeare of Christ one thousand foure hundred twentie and thre as some saie, or one thousand foure hundred and six as other haue (whereof I maie not determine anie thing by reason I cannot reconcile these defaults of numbers which haue happened through the contrarietie of bookes) Charles the seventh of that name king of France, sending ambassadozs into Scotland, to renew the old league betwene the two nations of France and Scotland, and to craue aid against the English, there were ambassadozs and other noble men sent likewise into France out of Scotland, with whose comming the French king being greatlie comforted, and hoping of good successe against the English by reason of the Scottish aid, he did vpon the comming of the Scots to the court creat this Archibald Dowglas (then erle of Wighton) duke of Touraine. But that honor continued not long with him, for in the yeare of Christ one thousand foure hundred twentie and foure, at the battell of Mernoile in Perth the English obtained the victorie, and this new duke with his sonne and heire James Dowglas earle of Wighoton was amongst others most vnfortunatlie laine.

Archibald
Dowglas
duke of Tour-
aine.

Archibald earle Dowglas was duke of Touraine, as I gather by the wordes of Lesleus touching this Archibalds sonne, of whom we will speake hereafter, and then set downe the same wordes of Lesleus to proue Archibald duke of Touraine, who married the earle of Craufozds daughter, by whom he had issue William earle Dowglas, a child of foureteene yeares old which succeded him, & one David Dowglas. After which this Archibald died at Alesfelrig in the yeare of Christ one thousand foure hundred thirtie and nine, being about the thirde yeare of king James the first.

William earle Dowglas a child of foureteene yeares of age succeded his father in his inheritances, and was after made duke of Touraine or Tou-rone, who being now earle Dowglas, deliuered forth such buds of vertue, as he lent great hope to all men of his worthinesse and good successe, to his further honor and his countries benefit. But in the end their expectations were deceiued after that he was made duke of Touraine: for being putt vp in pride with those great honors, he forgot himselfe, and wrought his owne and his countries harme, whereof we will not now speake; but onelie set downe Lesleus wordes touching his admittance to the duke-dome of Touraine. Gulielmus (which was this earle Dowglas) Malcolmum Flemingum dominum Cummirald & Alanu Lowder ad Carolum septi-mu Francorum regem misit, orati, vt ducatu Toro-nenis eius patrimoniam & dignitates amplificarentur: equum enim esse contendit, vt quo ducatu Archi-baldus Dowglasius (qui pro libertate Francie bello Vernolensi mortem oppetiuit) fruebatur & pater illius nuper mortuus potiebatur, idem ad se quoque perueniret. Carolus non inuitus concessit, quo dono quantum illi ad honorem dignitatemque cumuli, tantum profecto ad superbiam, insolentiamque ma-teriam accessit. Thus much Lesle, placing the same to be done as other authozs also do, in the yeare of Christ one thousand foure hundred thirtie and nine, being about the thirde yeare of the reigne of James the first of that name king of Scotland. Which honor he did not long inioie, for in the yeare following being the yeare of Christ one thousand foure hundred and fortie, and the fourth yeare of the same king James, he was, for that he would neither obeie the gouernment of the gouernor, or chancelloz, bidden to a banquet at Edinburgh castle, whereas when he and his brother David were set at dinner, the meat was suddenlie remoued, and a bulls head presented to the erle of Dowglas, being in those dates a token that he should shortly be executed. Immediatlie there-vpon, the said earle with his brother David, & Mal-colme Fleming lord of Cummirald were beheaded befoze the castle gate: so that this great honor seemed to those Scots which possessed the same, not much vnlike to the Seiane horse, or to the honor of the dukedome of Gloucester.

This prometh
Archibald
Dowglas
father to this William to be duke of Tour-
aine.

James earle of Arrane being made gouernor to Marie queene of Scots, in the yeare of Christ one thousand foure hundred fortie and two (in which being about seven daies old, he began the first yeare of his vnfortunate gouernement, which I maie so rightlie terme, because he was after deposed in the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred threescore and seuen, in the five and twentieth yeare of his reigne) was made

made duke of Chateaufort by the French king in the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred fiftie and foure, being the twelue yeare of the reigne of the same quene Marie, of whom I haue intreated more liberallie in my discourse of the protectors of Scotland, and therefore meane not to speake anie thing of that here: wherefore leauing these dukes, we will returne our pen to other matters done in Scotland.

This yeare there was a practise by forren persons of great state in Europe, to make some inuasion, or at the least some disturbance vpon or amongst such realmes as professed the gospel, and were enimies to the Romane religion, by meanes whereof as it was supposed, manye princes inclining their heads to the popes obedience, embracing his doctrine and resting at his disposition, expected the performance of some actions then to be done by them in the territories of the aduerser part, and in the realmes of such princes, as not onelie opposed themselves against the popes doctrine, but had also drawne their necks from the yoke of his subiection, in matters both of ciuill gouernement and of religion. Amongst which princes, being commonlie termed catholiks, the duke of Guise a person of great account in France, tied nerelie in blood to the imprisoned quene, and to the young king of Scots, and supported with other princes pursues, purposed to haue set full foot in Scotland, and to haue obtained the whole disposition and rule of that king and kingdom. But God, in whose hands resteth the ordering of princes harts, not permitting such determinations to sort to the purposed effect, did for that time frustrate the execution thereof.

For whereas the duke of Guise should with martiall power haue inuaded, entered and possessed Scotland, there arose troubles and turmoles of warres in his owne countrie of France, about the parts of Picardie and Walphine, which called him from the dispatch of that his former deuise, for the staing to appeale the same new insurrection, employing all his gathered forces thereunto, and countring with those persons: the rigor of the same warres so weakened his strength, that he was not able (without some new supplie of men and monie, which could not be had vpon the sudden) to produce his former intent to anie effect. But yet, least that the same intention might not seeme altogether to haue quailed, or that he should be noted to haue made shew to enterprize a thing which he neither could nor would prosecute to the bittermost; there was somewhat by his meanes and furtherance attempted in Scotland, which yet in the end fell forth in all respects to answer the expected hope of good successe therein. For partly by the policie of the Scots, and partly by the support of the allies and friends to the king, but altogether by the united strength of both sorts, the Scots rid themselves of the same deuise, and since remained safe from the danger of the Guise and of his partakers.

After this the earle of Morton, sometime regent of Scotland, being condemned to die, and ready to suffer that execution which was appointed vnto him, some persons had conference with him about matters of great importance, on the same date wherein he was to suffer, which persons so conferring with him, were John Durie, and master Walter Bannanquell. In which discourse betwene the earle and them these matters in substance amongst manye others fell forth, in questions propounded by them, and in answers made by him in this sort almost word for word, drawne into some seuerall heads and articles, as they were deliuered vnto me.

The examinations and answers of the earle of Morton before his death, but after his condemnation.

First he was exhorted by them that he should not be discouraged by his overthrow, in considering the estate wherunto he had bene once called in this world, but rather remembering the glorie to come, he should reioice and be of god comfort. Wherevnto he answered, that as concerning all the glorie which he had in this world, he respected it not, because he was persuaded that all worldlie honoz is but vanitie, and the broken reed of Egypt. And as concerning the estate wherunto he was brought, he thanked God for it, and was at that point, that he was rather content to render his life than to liue, because he knew, that as God had appointed the time for his death, so had he also appointed the manner thereof, seeing that now was the time, and this was the manner which best pleased his God to take him in, and therefore was content. And as for his life in this world, he cared not for it, in respect of that immortalitie, & the eternall lasting joy which he looked for, and thereof he was assured.

Secondlie, being required what was his part of knowledge in the kings death or murder: he answered with this attestation, that as he should answer to his Lord God, so he would declare all his knowledge therein: the sum wherof was, that after his returne out of England, whither he was banished for Dauides slaughter, he came out of Wetherborne to Wetheringham, where the erle Bothwell was at the same time, with whome there was communication about the kings murder, but he would not consent thereto. After which, opening a large discourse thereof, lateng the cause, the contriuing, and the execution of the same in great persons now liuing, and confessing that they vnderstood thereof, and durst not for manie causes reueale the same, neither to the king nor the kings father the earle of Aeneur; he added, how that in the end he was by the law noty of late conuicted of knowledge and concealing the kings murder, when as he should answer to God he had no part or knowledge in that matter. Furthermoze, shewing that after the earle of Bothwell was cleared of that murder by assise, that he and sundrie of the nobilitie subscribed a bond with the earle of Bothwell, that if anie should late the kings murder to his charge, he would assist him to the contrarie, and that therefore he subscribed to the quenes marriage with the earle Bothwell as sundrie other of the nobilitie did, being charged therevnto by the quenes owne writing and commandement.

Then being required in the name of the liuing God, that seeing this murder of the king was one of the most filthyest acts that euer was done in Scotland, and that the secrets thereof had not hitherto bene opened, neither who was the chiefe doer therein, or whether the king was then strangled or blowne by into the aire; that he should declare if he knew anie further secret therein: he answered, that as he should make answer to God, he knew no more secrets in that matter than he had already declared and heard, by the depositions of such as had already suffered for it, which depositions are yet extant. Againe, being demanded if he knew anie pretentie about the king, which were doers of that worke, by whose companie the king and commonwealth might be hurt: he answered that he knew none, neither would he accuse anie, &c.

Thirdlie, being examined of the poisoning of the earle of Athol, if he had anie act or part therein: he which was of Scots, slain

Christ 1566,

he answered with godd attestation, saying; Let God neuer be mercifull vnto me, if euer I knewe any thing of that matter, or heard of it before it came to my eares by the common bzute of the countrie. And being further demanded if he knewe that maister John Broundt brought him any poison; he replied that he knewe no such thing, and that he knewe nothing by maister Broundt but honestie, to which he more added these speeches; Fie, fie, there is ouer much filthinesse in Scotland alreadye, God forbid that vile practising of poisoning should enter among vs: I would not for all the earledome of Athlone, haue neither ministred poison to him, or caused it to haue bene ministred, yea if there had been one hundred on my part, and but he alone, I would not haue stirred one heate of his head.

Fourthlie, being demanded if he made any conspiracie against the earle of Lenex: he answered with like attestation as before, that he neuer thought in his heart, or once purposed any conspiracie against the earle of Lenex, neither minded to him any hurt in bodie or otherwise. But it grieved him that the earle of Lenex knewe not the estate of their countrie, nor yet perceived the danger of the kings person. For being thereunto requested by others, sundrie were brought home who were the kings enemies, ouerthrowers of the kingdome, and enemies to religion; whereby there was apparant danger to his person and the reime: all which he hoped to haue helped by counsell, when the earle of Lenex familiarity and his should haue bene greater.

Fiftlie, being demanded whether he had any league or dealing with England for the conuening of the king or otherwise, or if he had any pension of the queene of England for that purpose, he answered in these words: As I shall answer to God vnder paine of condemnation or saluation, I neuer had any dealings with England that waie: there was neuer one in Scotland or England, neither the queene nor any in his name, that euer moued any such thing to me, so indirectly as to conueie the king into England; it neuer entred into my hart, I would not for all the realme of England haue put him into England, except that it had bene for his profit and honor, &c. And for the more clere purgation of my selfe in this matter I will saie, if euer I meant but directly his wealth, let God neuer be mercifull vnto me; and I shall neuer aske God mercie for any thing that entred in my hart against the king: yea there was nothing more that I regarded in this life, than that he should be brought vp in vertue and godlinesse. And I will saie more. If I had bene as carefull to serue God & walke in his feare, as I was to seeke the kings wealth, I had not bene brought to the point I am at this daie. And where they allege I was the queene of Englands pensionarie, as I shall answer to God, I had neuer pension of the queene of England in all my life. And although they caused the bzute to go, that I should haue furnished the queene of Englands souldiours now last vpon the borders, I neuer knewe of it. And last of all, where they allege that I should haue bene a great dealer with England, I praise God I neuer had dealing with them, but for the weale publike of the king, his countrie, and subiects, &c.

Sixtly, being demanded what was his part of the enterpryse of the castell of Sterling, he answered, that he knewe nothing of it till it was done; but being in Lochleven, he receiued aduertisement out of the castell of Sterling, and a writing from the king, that he should come thither. And whereas they said, that he minded to keepe the king in captiuitie there, the truth was, that he neuer meant to keepe him in captiuitie there or in any other place. But he vnderstood by the kings owne speaking, that he was as free at that time as euer he was before, or desired to be, for the present: And if he had knowne that his grace would haue gone to any other place, where greater libertie had bin, he would gladly haue gone with him.

Seuenthly, being laid to his charge, that he was a great hinderance of the matters and authoritie of the bishops, &c: when he might haue done much good for the furtherance of Gods glorie & advancement of his gospell, both in the time of his gouernement, and since: his answer was, that concerning the religion and doctrine as then it was preached and professed in Scotland, he alwaies meant well in his hart to it, and acknowledged it to be the verie truth of God; inso much that rather than any hurt should haue come vnto the religion, he would haue spent his life and goods in the defense, like as now he was contented to die in the constant profession thereof. But indeed as concerning some things in policie of the church, as the state of the bishops, and such like, which were in question betwene him and the church, he did therein according to his knowledge, and followed the opinion which he thought to be best at that time, in consideration of the estate of all things as they were. Howbeit he would not stand in defense of those things which he then did, but yet he would make this protestation, that as he should answer to God, he did nothing in those matters either of contempt, malice, or enuie; but if there were any things done amisse, it was of ignorance, and for lacke of better knowledge; and if he had knowne better, he would haue done otherwise, being now purposed at the last to haue holpen them so farre as he might.

Eighthly, he was desired in the name of God, not to stand in his owne innocencie, but plainlie to confesse his sinnes to Gods glorie, and to thinke, that howsoeuer it be that men haue done in this life, yet God had alwaies before him whereof he might be worthy of this and more: whereunto he yielded this speech; Howsoeuer it be that men haue done, I commit them to God and their owne consciences. But I acknowledge indeed, that God hath alwaies done iustlie to me, and not onlie iustlie but mercifullie also, because amongst all the other sinners I confesse my selfe to be one of the greatest and filthiest abusers of my bodie in the pleasures of the flesh; and also to haue giuen my selfe so much to the world, to the pleasures thereof, and to other sinnes, that God might iustlie laie it to my charge, in that I expessed not the fruits of my profession in my life and conuersation as I ought to haue done, for which I beseech God to be mercifull vnto me. And indeed now I acknowledge the great mercie of God in this, that amongst all the benefits which he hath bestowed vpon me, one of the chiefest is, that he hath in this my last trouble giuen me space and leasure to repent me of my sinnes, and to be at a point with God. In which trouble also I haue found farre greater comfort than euer I could find before, because I haue thereby concluded thus with my selfe, that if God should haue spared my life, and deliuered me out of this trouble, I should then haue cast awaie all the cares of the world, the pleasures of the flesh, the delights of earthly things, and declared my selfe to serue my God in all kind of quietnesse and simplicitie. And if it shall please God to take me in this trouble, I am concluded also to be content therewith, being alwaies assured of the mercies of God. And for that cause I do now thanke God that I find my selfe at this point, that I am rather content to die than to liue; and that I shall not see the miseries to come: for I will assure you you that I thinke this to be the most acceptable time that ever God could haue taken me in, because I perceiue and see such miseries and confusions to issue, that I thanke God that I shall not see them. And you who doe feare God, and liue after me, when you shall see these things, you will wisly to be where I shall be, that is, with him.

Twentiethlie, being demanded what he thought of the forme of iudgement vsed against him, what his opinion therof was, whether he thought ante wrong done vnto him or no, &c: he answered, I would be verie loth to find fault or blame the noble men which haue taken themselves vpon their consciences to condemne me, but I will remit them to God and their owne consciences; yet I am moued to speake somewhat frellie in this matter which is this: I saw such parciall dealing against me, that it hath bene all one to me, if I had bene as innocent as saint Stephan, or that I had bene as gillie as Iudas was: for I perceiued there was nothing sought but my life, howsoeuer things had bene, which appeareth in this, that no exception of ante person which was to passe vpon my asslie could be admitted: for I required the earle of Argile to purge himselfe of parciall counsell giuen to the pursuer my accuser; he purged himselfe indeed, but I knew the contrarie, that he gaue parciall counsell to him. Likewise the lord of Manton, the lord of Setton, and such others, who were knowen to be my enemies, (notwithstanding lawfull exception) were put vpon my quest. In consideration wherof I can not but be persuaded of one thing, which it behooueth me to communicat vnto you, and it is thus. I perceiue it is not my life that they seeke onelie, but they who are authours of my death haue some other purpose in hand, which they perceiue will not be done, except I and such other which doe fauor the good cause, were taken out of the waie: Wherefore I can not but suspect that I haue bene so handled, and that such as hereafter shall be put therevnto, may haue a more plaine waie to do their turne or intent: and I praie God that they which are to liue behind me see not the practise thereof, but I feare it soze. And therefore in respect of this apparant danger of the common cause, I will giue my counsell to the king my master, and wisly you in the name of God to beare it to him, the summe wherof is this. I perceiue that they which haue bene the kings foes and enemies, are brought into credit & court, and they who haue bene the mainteiners of his crowne & good friends, are discredited and mistiked of. And likewise such as are knowen to be papists, and suspected to be enemies to the religion, are ouer familiar and great in credit with his maiestie, which surely can not be without great danger to the religion, and hurt to his estat. For which cause I admonish him in the name of God to beware of them, and to seeke a remedie thereof. And as he hath bene brought by in the feare of God, and companie of good men, so to continue therein, and not to go backe, or else he hath done with it for euer. For I tell you what moueth me to speake thus, which is, that the state of religion in this countrie appeared neuer to be in such danger, and that for this cause. I here saie there is a dealing put in practise betwene France and England, and Monsieurs marriage with the queene is like to be feared; if France and England bind together, and that marriage go forward, you may easilie vnderstand, that the one of them will persuade the other to their religion, &c.

Tenthlie, being required to giue his counsell to the earle of Angus, and to shew him what was meetest to be done, seeing presentlie he was in great trouble, he answered; I dare giue him no counsell, and I will tell you whie; to bid him come in, partlie I dare not, all men may see in what danger he is although he now come in: and to counsell him to abide forth I dare not, for then he shall lose the kings fauour for euer, himselfe and his heritage, friends and all; and therefore the best counsell that I can giue him in this matter is, that he make all meanes possible to purchase the kings fauor againe, and to see if he may haue ante assurance of his life; and that he may serue his God and his king trulie, and submit himselfe, and all that he hath to his maiesties goodwill: he hath done nothing yet, but it may be amended. I saie no more, the Lord giue him his spirit to follow that which is best.

Eleuenthlie being required to declare what was the summe of that admonition, which John Knoke gaue him before he accepted the regiment, when he came vnto him a little before his departre, he answered: I shall tell you as far as I can remember. First, he asked of me if I knewe ante thing of the kings murder, I answered in deed I knewe nothing of it. Then he said vnto me, Well God hath beautified you with manie benefitts which he hath not giuen to experie man, for he hath giuen to you riches, wife, home and friends, and now he is to prefer you to the gouernement of this realme: and therefore in the name of God I charge you, to vse these benefitts aright, and better in time to come than you haue done in times past; first to Gods glorie, to the furtherance of the gospel, to the maintenance of the church of God & of his ministers, next for the weale of the king, his realme and true subiects: which if you shall not do, God shall spoile you of these benefitts, and your end shall be ignominie & shame. When being inquired if he said true or no, he answered: I haue found it true, and yet I doubt not but the Lord will be mercifull vnto me.

Twelfelie, being demanded for what cause he held some of the neighbours of Edinburgh in ward, he answered: Surely I meant no euill to those men, but it was done in this respect: we had the matter of Bulzoine then in hand, and I was informed that they were hinderers therof, for which cause I thought it best at that time to put them in ward for a while vntill the turne had bene done. And if I did them ante wrong, I craue forgiveness of them as I forgive all men.

Thirtenthlie, being required to declare if he knew before hand that he should be accused of this matter or no, he answered: I was advertised in deed, and might haue escaped, but I would not, trusting alwaie vnto mine innocencie, and therefore supposed that they would not condemne me vpon such a thing. After this, the said earle with the foresaid John Durie and Walter Balcanquall did together call to God by earnest praier, which being ended the earle said vnto vs (meaning the said Durie and Balcanquall who as I gather were the penners of this matter) I thanke you hartlie for your comfort which you haue offered to me, for now in deed is greatest need of comfort, and therefore as you haue begun, I praie you to continue with me: for now that I am come to the knowledge of mine owne sinnes, there resteth onlie two things which I craue of you, that is first that you will shew vnto me some kind of argument, whereby I may be comforted against naturall death, because the flesh is fearefull and weake; whose desire we trauelled to satisfie by long conference, which is too long to rehearse in euerie point, yet the summe of that was thus. It was said vnto him that there were three things wherewith which might make him assured of the mercie of God in Christ: first the innumerable and comfortable promises of God contained in his word, wherewith it behoued him alwaies to leane. Secondlie the example of Gods mercie practised towards his owne seruants, albeit they haue bene great sinners; as appeared in Dauid, Agabalen, Peter, and the these, &c. Whiche the often experiences of Gods mercies from time to time, which he had found in his owne person, being a light to assure him of his mercie. In the end he answered to this, saying: I know it to be true, for since I past to Dunbarton I haue read the five booke of Moses, Iosue, the Judges, and now I am in Samuell, and will tell you what I haue found there. I see that the mercie of God is wonderfull, and alwaies inclined to haue pittie vpon his owne people: for there it appeareth that although he punished them so oft as they sinned, yet as soon as they turned againe to him, he was mercifull vnto them, and when they sinned againe he punished them, and as often as they repented he was mercifull againe, and therefore I am assured, that albeit that I haue offended against my God, yet he will be mercifull vnto me. Also further in this point it was said vnto him, that in case sathan should trauell to discourage him in consideration of the iustice of God on the one part, and of his sinnes on the other part, we exhorted him to the contrarie, to be of good courage, and that in respect of the verie selfe same iustice of God, which will not suffer him twise to take payment for one thing, as we know in the common dealing of men: for he that is a iust man will not twise demand payment of that whereof he was already paid, for sith Christ died for our sinnes, and paid the uttermost farthing that God could craue, he cannot laie our sinnes vnto our charge being satisfied in Christ, because his iustice will not suffer him twise to take payment for one thing. Vnto this the earle answered, Cruelle it is verie god.

And concerning the naturall feare of death, we exhorted him to be alwaies exercised in the consideration of the glorie, iote, and felicitie of the life to come, which would be the onlie waie to swallow vp the feare of this naturall death. Wherevnto he answered, I praise God I do so. This being thus done, and he being in his hand a pretie treatise of the meditation of death, written by Wadford (which he said that he had gotten from the ladye Darnelston before he went into ward, and for that cause before he came forth of prison againe gaue it to maister Latson, desiring him to deliuer it to the said ladye againe) he willed maister Walter to read him a peece thereof, which he did, in which reading (haunting sundrie confessions vpon the thing read) both he and we found great comfort, in so much that he said; I protest now that I heare with other eares than I did before. Wherevnto being called to breakfast, he earnestly desired vs to take part with him (as we did) at what time he eat his meat with great cheerefulness, as all the companie saw, and as appeared by these his words: I see there is great difference (said he) betwene a man which is troubled with the cares of the world, and him which is free from them, the which I haue found by these two former nights: for before mine accusation, I could not in things find ante rest by reason of cares which I had, because I was to be accused vpon the morrow; and therefore being carefull to answer euerie point that should be laide vnto my charge I could not sleepe: but this night, after that I was condemned, and knew that I should die, I was at a point with my selfe, and had nothing of this world, nor care of this life, but cast my onelie care vpon God, and I praise God I neuer slept better in my life than I did this night. When he said vnto the steward, William you can heare me record of this; who answered, It is true my lord. Then maister Walter said vnto him, My lord I will drinke to you vpon a condition, vpon this condition my lord, that you and I shall drinke together in the kingdome of heauen, of that immortall drinke which shall neuer suffer vs to thirst againe. Wherevnto the earle answered, Cruelle I will pledge you maister Walter on the same condition. After which he said, John Durie, now John I will drinke to you vpon the same condition. This thus ended for that time, and thanks being giuen to God, the earle passed againe to his chamber, at what time maister James Latson came to him, with whom he considered the substance of all other things againe. After this we departed from him.

Then at afternone we came to him againe, with sundrie of the brethren of the ministerie, as maister James Latson, maister Robert Point, Dauid Fargalane, maister David Hensla, John Bzard, maister James Garnichie, and maister John Dautson, whom the earle receiued verie louinglie in his arms, and said to him; Maister John you wrote a little booke in deed, but trulle I meant neuer euill towards you in my mind, forgive me, and I forgive you: vpon which words maister John was moued with teares. Then all the brethren being present, the earle repeated againe the cheefe substance of all the things whereof before he spake, being demanded thereof point by point, as their testification of this matter subscribed by them at more length will declare. After which the earle was called to his dinner about two of the clocke in the after none, who being thus at his dinner, the brethren of the ministerie were informed that there was trust report made of his profession to the king, & that he should haue confessed much otherwise than he did, whereby the king might haue a worse opinion of him. Wherefore they thought good to send down some before his suffering to informe his maiestie of the truth of his confession: which persons so sent were Dauid Fargalane, John Durie, and John Bzard, who before his death did largelie tell the simple truth of his confession (as it was made) vnto the kings maiestie. At their returning the earls keeper required him that he would come forth to the scaffold, wherevnto the earle answered; Sith they haue thus troubled me overmuch this daie with two double things, I supposed that they should haue giuen me one nights leisure to haue aduised my selfe with my God. Then the keeper said, All things are redie now my lord, and I thinke they will not staie. The earle replied, I am redie also I praise God: and so comfortable prayer being made, the earle passed downe to the gate, intending to go directly to the scaffold; but the earle of Arrane staied him, brought him backe againe to the chamber, and willed him to staie until his confession should be put in writing & subscribed with his owne hand. Wherevnto the ministers which were present answered, and the earle also answered: Pate my lord, I praye you trouble me no more with these things, for now I haue another thing to muse vpon, which is to prepare me for my God. And sith I am at a point to go to my death, I can not write in the estate wherein I now am; and all these honest men can testifie that I haue spoken in that matter. With which answer the earle of Arrane being satisfied, he said to him, My lord you will be reconciled with me, for I haue done nothing vpon ante particular quarell against you. The earle of Morton replied, It is no time now to remember quarels, I haue no quarell to you nor to ante other, I forgive you and all others as I would you forgive me. And so after with a good courage he passed to the scaffold, who being vpon the scaffold, repeated in few words the substance of the things before confessed, &c. adding some exhortation to the people which he spake not before, in this sort.

Sure

Sure I am the king shall lose a good servant this daie, and so he exhorted the people, saying: I testifie before God, that as I professe the gospell which this daie is taught & professed in Scotland; so also now I willinglie laie downe my life in the persecution thereof. And albeit I haue not walked according thereto as I ought, yet I am assured that God will be mercifull vnto me; and I charge you all in God which are professors of the gospell, that you continue the true professing and maintaining thereof to your power, as I would haue done God willing with my life, lands, and goods as long as I had liued: which if you do, I assure you God shall be mercifull vnto you; but if you do it not, be sure the vengeance of God shall fall vpon you, both in bodie and soule. As concerning all the rest of the words which he had vpon the scaffold, he spake them in effect and more ample before. When all these speeches were ended vpon the scaffold, a comfortable prayer was made by maister John Lawson, during the time of which prayer, the erle Porton laie grouning vpon his face before the place of execution, his bodie making great reboundings with sighes and sobes, being euident signes of the inward and mightie working of the spirit of God, as all they which were present, and knew what it was to be earnestlie moued in prayer, might easilie perceiue.

The prayer being ended, and sundrie coming to him before his death, he did most louinglie receiue them; who after he had taken vs all by the hand that were about him, & bidden vs farewell in the Lord, he passed both constantlie, patientlie, and humble (without feare of death) to the place of execution, and laid his necke vnder the axe being vnbound. And there maister Walter putting him alwaies in mind to call vpon God; the earle continually cried vntill his head was stricken off, Lord Iesus receiue my spirit, Lord Iesus receiue my spirit: which words he spake euen while the axe fell on his necke. Now what soeuer he had bene before, he constantlie died the servant of God. And howsoeuer it be that his foes alleged, that as he liued proudlie, so he died proudlie; the charitable seruants of God could perceiue nothing in him but all kind of humilitie in his death: inasmuch that we are assured, that his soule is receiued into the soles and glories of the heauens; and we praise God, that they which are behind, may learne by his example to die in the true feare of God our Lord. Thus far the confession & death of the earle Porton, penned by such of the presbyterie as were present thereat.

In a parlement holden in Edinburgh the eight & twentieth of Januarie, in this yeare one thousand five hundred fourescore and one, being the fourteenth of the kings reigne, were matters established, touching the ecclesiasticall gouernement, whereof I meane not fullie to set downe the same, sith my pen & purpose is bent to treat of politicall and not spiritual causes. Wherefore onelie determining but tuall causes. Wherefore onelie determining but slenderlie, and by the waie to touch that matter, set forth in print at Cambridge, vnder the stamp of Thomas Thomas, printer for that vniuersitie, in this yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred fourescore and six, we saie that the same booke, published by the Scots (and intituled, A generall confession of the true christian faith and religion, according to Gods word and our acts of parlement subscribed by the kings maiestie and his household, with diuerse others, &c.) hath further, after the preface thereof this title giuen vnto it. The estates of Scotland with the inhabitants of the same, professing Christ Iesus & his holie Gospell, to their naturall countrymen and to all other realmes & nations, professing the same Iesus Christ with them, with grace, mercie, and peace from God the father of our Lord Iesus Christ, with the spirit of righteous iudgement of saluation.

After which title and salutation, the substance of the same booke, being declared in the forhead of the chapters following, containeth these heads: First of God, then of the creation of man, next of originall sinne, fourthly of the reuelation of the promise of the continuance, increase, and preservation of the church, of the incarnation of Christ Iesus, why it becometh the mediator to be verie God and man, of election, of Christs death, passion, and buriall, of his resurrection, of his ascension, of faith in the holie ghost, of the cause of good works, that works are reputed good before God, of the perfection of the law and the imperfection of man, of the church, of the immortallitie of soules, of the notes by which the true church is discerned from the false, and who shall be iudge of the doctrine, of the authoritie of the scriptures, of generall counsels, of their power, authoritie & cause of their conuention, of the sacraments, of the right administration of the sacraments, to whom sacraments appertene, of the ciuill magistrat, and of the gifts frelie giuen to the church, &c.

The discourse of all which matters, being in that booke largelie and iudiciallie handled, both for the declaration of the faith of those people, and for the further instruction of others, were shortly after the agreement thereto in that parlement confirmed by the king, and commanded to be published and to be sed through his realme, as appeareth by this his following precept concerning the same.

The kings maiesties charge to all commissioners and ministers within his realme.

Seeing that we and our household haue subscribed & giuen this publike confession of our faith, to the good example of our subiects, we command and charge all commissioners and ministers to craue the same confession of their parishioners, and to proceed against the refusers according to our lawes, and order of the church; deliuering their names and labour full proccesse to the ministers of our house, with all hast and diligence, vnder the paine of fortie pounds to be taken from their stipend: that we with the aduise of our counsell may take order with such proud contentners of God, and our lawes. Subscribed with our hand at Holierod house one thousand five hundred foure score and one, the second daie of March, the fourteenth yere of our reigne.

Religion thus settled in Scotland, it fell herupon that Amies duke of Lennox, to which honoz he was not long before aduanced, as is already set downe in the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred three score and nineteene, was now in this yeare vpon displeasure, conceived against him by others of the nobilitie, banished Scotland, and enforced to returne into France, there to passe the rest of his life as he had done before. In whose erle was performed an old prophesie, which I haue heard, that a nag of five shillings should beare all the dukes of England and Scotland. For when this duke was out of the Scottish kingdome, there was neither duke in that countrie or England. But as I greatlie fauor not these things; so yet finding manie of them to sort to vnhappie successe; I cannot altogether condemne them, especiallie sith I find two other which concerning the last duke of England, being the duke of Summer set, did prognosticat both the aduancement of religion by him, and that he should not long kepe his head on his shoulders, after that he began to make his stately buildings. Of which propheticall verses declaring the same, the first was,

Cessabit missa cum regnat equa marina.

The other propheticall mentioning his name of honor was in this sort, as also the time of his fall:

Aestatis sedes cum scandis ad alta per ades,

Pro certo credes quod caput perdere debes.

And to prove that Summerseat was manie yeres past called in Latine Aestatis sedes, I find this matter in Roger Wall, sometime an herald living in the time of Henrie the first, who named him accordingly, when the said author expressing himselfe of all eloquence, and complaining of his owne rudenesse, sent his booke to M. John Summerseat to correct; which doctor being the kings schoolmaster and physician, a great learned man well sene in the mathematics, one that had written much therein, and be- rie eloquent also, was (as this Roger Wall thought) most meet to have the oversight of his worke: which matter is set downe in the latter end of the same worke of the acts of Henrie the first.

Vecors, inculca, pauper & pannosa pagina, video quia nuditatem, pauperiem, ac ruditatem tuam expauescens patefaci: ad hoc immensa verecundiae terrore ducta in lustralibus latebris, & abditis desertis, & inuijs latitare decreuisti, fortassis tamen, si quenquam reperies qui nuditatem tuam operire, pauperiem tuam locupletare, & ruditatem tuam reformare dignaretur, indutura fores animositatis spiritum processura in lucem. Eia igitur consilij meis adquiescere non deseras: & meis monitis edocta, doctorem gloriosum inuenies, qui Aestatis sedes gloriosum cognomen sortitus est, &c. Supplica igitur pauperrima pagina pauperibus illis, vt tibi Aestatis sedem velint ostendere, &c. After which this Wall setteth downe the supplication, which his booke should dedicate to this doctor (when he hath found him) in these verses, beginning also with the same name of Aestatis sedes, in English Summerseat:

Ferilis Aestatis flori da sedes, Morum multiplici luce resurgens, Gloria doctorum gemma scientum, Eloquij pelagus, lux medicina, Pectore caelesti calica condans, Praradians alijs lumine mentis, Cui patet astrorum candida turba, Et motus primi mobilis orbis, Nec latet eiusdem mira rapina, Quid flammis ignis in orbe, Aerisque sinus abyssa nosti? &c.

Thus hauing exprest the words and verses of Roger Wall, which in Latine termed some hundred yeres passed (as you haue heard before) the name of Summerseat by the words of Aestatis sedes, I haue trauell bene the willinger to set downe the same by waie of digression (besides the former declared causes which moued me thereto) for that I would not suffer so worthy a man as that John Summerseat was to be buried in oblivion.

But leaning our Englishmen, let vs returne to the affaires of Scots and Scotland: intreating first of some thing done by them in the low countries, where one Stewart a Scot, hauing had charge of men in some part of the low countries of Flanders, Zelant, and Holland, under William of Nassau, earle of Arange, did not fall from the states of that countrie, emploie all his force on the king of Spaines side, and went to assist the prince of Parma (the deputie of king Philip in those parts) because the states did not paie to him and his soldiers their due stipend and wages for the wars. At what time also the garrison of Burels were for the like cause in an uprore. But some portion of monie being offered vnto them, they were for that time somewhat pacified. All which notwithstanding, one certaine Scot, called Aitchfield, & surnamed Sempie, being capteine of the garrison of Lire, and long vnpaid his sallarie for those warres, did in vaine manie times demand that monie due vnto him. Whereupon, imagining with himselfe how he might deceiue Aitchfield the gouernour of the citie, as they had beguiled him in detaining of his due, he deuised with a new stratagem to bring his towne into the subiection of Philip king of Spaine. Wherefore, setting him selfe that he would in the middelt of the night with his people go forth to bring home some great bottie for his and the townes benefit, he departed the towne, and late in the night gathered together a great prete of catell, horses, oxen, kine, sheepe, and such like, with some prisoners of the kings part. All which he brought to the towne gate of Lire, and then commanded the gates to be opened vnto him, whereby they with their bottie might enter all at once. But the porter fearing at such time of night to set the gates full abrode, onelie opened a little wicket or doore, thereby to receiue Sempie into the towne. Which thing Sempie then perceiving (e not finding all things to answer his expectation) feined that the enemies were hard at their backs, would kill them all, and recover their bottie, vnlesse he did speedilie open the great gate, through the same to receiue them into the towne all at once. When the porter believing all this to be true, forthwith set open the great gates of the citie; which done, the Scot entereth therat, slue those which kept the watch, possessed the towne, & into the same receiued the kings souldiours, which were not farre behind, but secretlie laie in wait expecting the successe of this deuise. By which meanes the Spaniards and their followers first toone the market place, and the next daie after the kalends of August reduced the whole towne of Lire vnder their owne subiection: the same Lire being a place well fenced, and set in such a convenient soile, that it would prohibit all passage and carriage to come to Antwerpe, Mechelin and Burels.

In March was renewed a great & old contention betwene the lord Marwell earle of Dorset warden of the west marches of Scotland, and the lord of Johnstane; the occasion of which new dissention proceeded of an old enmitie begun in the time of Douglas earle of Dorset beheaded, as before in the yere of Christ one thousand five hundred eightie and one, touching the receiuing of the same wardenship. In which hurle burlie the lord of Johnstane behaued himselfe vnto rigourlie against the lord Marwell, in blowing by both gunpowder the locks of the castell of Lochmaben. Which dissention secretlie after the death of Douglas earle of Dorset, continuing betwene the lord Marwell and Johnstane, with further increase of malice, they in this yere sought a fresh reuenge thereof, with the lord Johnstane had not (before this) either power or meanes to encounter with the lord Marwell. But now the ladie Johnstane (being vnto familiar and fauored with and of James Stewart earle of Arrane) obtained of the king some succors of men of warre against the lord Marwell earle of Dorset, his husband (as was supposed) not being able otherwise to make his part good against the same earle. Whereupon capteine Lammie and capteine Crane were sent with two companies of backbuts vnto the reliefe of the lord of Johnstane. Who being thus furnished, did in the kings name raise the nobilitie and countrie therabout to assist him with their powers: which being had, he meant and therfore went to haue joined with the said two capteines Lammie and Crane. But as man purposeth, and God disposeth quite Robert Marwell bade together to earle of Dorset first against capteine Lammie.

Capteine Lammie & Crane were sent to the town.

The lord Johnstane forced to flee.

The lord of Dorset commanded the contention betwene earle of Dorset and the lord Johnstane.

quite contrarie to our determination. So the lard Johnstane was disappointed of that meeting; for the earle Morton (whose heedfull watch was not idle in learning out the deuises of his enemies, a needfull policie for all such as intend to bring great actions to effect) having intelligence by some of his friends tendering his safetie, of this determination and preparation of the lard Johnstane, and wiselie (as behoued him) seeing what danger might rise vnto him, if their two forces met, which would rise to a greater number than he were able to encounter, and iudging it best in the beginning to prouide for mischefe, and to stop their passage, did prepare to present all their deuises, and for that cause sent his base brother Robert Sparwell capteine of Langholme with some horsemen and footmen vnder the conduct of James Fraiser brother to the lord of Fulforth, which Robert meeting on Craisford mere with the foresaid captaine Lamie and Craneffane, before that they had ioined with the lard Johnstane gaue the charge vpon them, and that so fiercelie as they ouerthrew the whole strength of his enemies, Que Lamie, toke Craneffane prisoner, and so handled the matter that all the rest were taken or slaine except some few, who sought their liues by the benefit of streng. After which victorie the report thereof came to the lard Johnstane, who desirous to be reuenged thereof, used the helpe of other meanes when he perceived that force would not preuaile. And for that cause assembling such power as he had, he used the strength of one element against another, of the highest against the lowest, of the heauen against the earth, of the fire against mettall, and of burning against fighting. For with all speed he hastened to the lands of the earle Morton, which he cruelly spoiled, and in the same did burne certeine houses and other places belonging to the earle, as Comers freres, Dumcoll, Colobill, and such like. Whereupon the earle Morton, who in like sort did not neglect his owne cause, but as opportunitie serued, sought the requitall thereof, did with the like furie, but with more hurt, enter the lands of Johnstane, bitterlie spoiled them, and yet not so satisfied, committed to the fire both the castles of Louchhouse and Louchwood belonging to Johnstane, and Que sundrie gentlemen of name, the friends to Johnstane, being persons of good sort, as the two brothers of Lokierbie, a brother of the lord Manerfraie, some of the sons of John of Johnstane of Polgill, with others. Which done, the earle Morton proceeded vnto further pursue, and determining finally to reuenge himselfe vpon Johnstane, and his followers, forced the lard Johnstane himselfe to flee his furie. Wherefore he fled to a strong house called the Bonshaw castle belonging to Edward Priuine of the Bonshaw, whome the earle pursued, and besieged in the same place, at what time he so battered the castle with artillerie, that the house was almost gotten. Which being perceived of those within, not able to make further resistance, they fell to parley, and so to composition; whereby in the end the matter was wholly compounded and ended betwixen them, by the mediation and furtherance of the lord Scrope of England, with certeine conditions to be performed as well on the part of the earle as of the lard Johnstane. But the coles of inward griefe being couered with cold ashes of outward reconciliation, did not long lie couered, but in the end began afresh to shew their fire. For the lard Johnstane falling from the said accord, vpon what occasion I know not, either for cause giuen by the earle Morton, or for an euill disposition in himselfe, or for both, they burst forth againe into the like conflicts & part taking, which in the end falling to the worst, for the lard Johnstane, he was taken betwixen Cirtwall and the Warden ditches (where he was laid in ambush to haue performed some action against the said Robert Sparwell comming from the towne of Domfrees to Laugham from the earle Morton his brother) by William Carrutheris (baron of Holmence and capteine of the kings castell named Traffe) being by the earle Morton appointed to encounter with the said lard Johnstane: which this baron was the more willing to do, because he intirely loved the earle, and had alwaies from the beginning followed the earles faction.

These things thus performed and the successe thereof comming to the kings knowledge, he grew so heauilie displeased with the earle Morton, that he was scarce able to susteine the kings displeasure, by reason that the earle attempted these things against the kings mind, when the king had supported the lard Johnstane with men and weapons. But the kings displeasure onlie growing against the earle, was partlie for that the earle of Arrane did bitterlie exasperat the cause against him, and partlie by the persuation & lamentation of the ladie of Johnstane, whereof the last was enemie to the earle, as of dutie he ought in respect of hir husband, and the first (which was the earle of Arrane) became a bitter and heauie enemie besides all reason against earle Morton, because that Morton refused to exchange the baronies of Poke and Sparwell betwix with Arrane, which most instantlie required the same, in respect they adioined nere vnto other lands which Arrane had procured to himselfe. For although that Arrane would in place of those required lands haue deuiered others of no lesse value and honoz (for he would haue giuen the baronie of Minneile for the same) yet Morton had good cause and no lesse reason not to yeld thereto: as well for that Sparwell betwix was his ancient inheritance, and the first land which his ancestors had, and whereof they toke the name of lord Sparwell; as for that, that there were manie of the surname of the Sparwells, who dwelling vpon these lands, would not become subiect to the earle of Arrane, as they must haue bene if he had departed with those lands; amongst which Sparwells so refusing to become tenants to Arrane, were John Sparwell lard of Betwarke, and William Sparwell lard of Poke.

This thus handled, the king assembled a parliament in Spate, wherein were certeine lawes enacted, which giuing occasion to some of the nobilitie and clergie to misconceiue thereof, and to depart the realme, did after minister cause to the king (for the more discharge of his honour, the better explaining of the said lawes, and the manifesting of secret practises against him) to set downe this following declaration thereof to the view of the world. Wherein he shewed himselfe of a rare and good disposition, in that he would humble himselfe beneath the maiestie of his crowne, publikelie to tender a reason to his neighbours and to his subiects of his dealings, towards such as were vnder his government, sith he was not bound thereto, being to dispose of those his subiects according to the lawes of his realme and the customes of those countries. But before I set downe that declaration, I thinke it not vnmeet to saie somewhat of such things as went before, and were the cause of setting forth of the same declaration. There were some lawes in the same parlement enacted for the reformation of religion, which to the king seemed to be growne ouer dangerous, in seeking a certeine equalitie of government in the ecclesiasticall hierarchie. Vpon which law established, the earles of Angus and Spar, with diuers others of the temporalitie and the spiritualtie, as Andrewe Spelaine, and such as professed the purer and reformed religion (as it was termed) were enforced for the vse of their conscience and for other causes, to banish themselves from their countrie, and to flee into England there to vse the libertie of their religion, and to provide for the safetie of their persons, who coming into this realme, made their abode and sojourned at Norwich. About which time also of their departure out of Scotland, there was a supposed treason discovered by Robert Hamilton unto the king, intended to be practised against his maiestie, whereupon some were summoned upon suspicion, some were apprehended, and some were executed for the same cause. Of the first sort, the lord Blakater and George Dologlasse were summoned to the court upon suspicion that they were consenting and conelcing to and of the same treasons. For the second part touching the same, the lord of Donthasell, the lord of Dunkreth, the lord of Baithkist, Robert Hamilton of Inchmachan, and James Sterling, were apprehended at the kings court: besides which John Hopplingell of the Howes was taken at his owne house by the capteine of the kings gard, and the lord Keier with the lord Spains and other gentlemen were taken about Sterling; and lastlie the lord Donthasell and the lord Spains were executed, with the lord Ruthwine earle of Cotwike, treasurer of Scotland, who was beheaded in Scotland. Which being thus done, the king as is before said made this following declaration upon the said acts of parliament, in which he sheweth reason and cause why he ought and might both make and execute those laws, with a further explanation also of the same lawes deliuered in that declaration with these wordes.

The kings maiesties declaration of his acts confirmed in parlement.

As much as there is some enill affected men that goeth about so farre as in them lieth, to inuent lies and tales to slander and impeire the kings maiesties fame and honor, & to raise reports as if his maiestie had declined to papistrie, & that he had made manie acts to abolish the free passage of the gospell, good order and discipline in the church: which byrtes are maintained by rebellious subjects, who would gladlie couer their seditious enterprises vnder pretense of religion (albeit there can be no god religion in such as raise rebellion to disquiet the state of their native soueraigne, and peruerbedie both stand against the duty, band, & obligation of their faith, whereunto they haue subscribed) therefore that his maiesties faithfull subjects be not abused with such slanderous reports, and his highnesse good affectionat friends in other countries maie vnderstand the verities of his vpright intention, his highnesse hath commanded this breife declaration of certeine of his maiesties acts of parlement holden in Maye one thousand five hundred foure scoze and foure, to be published and imprinted, to the effect that the indirect practises of such as slander his maiestie and his lawes maie be detected and discovered.

In the first act his maiestie ratifieth and approueth the true profession of the gospell, sincere preaching of the word and administration of the sacraments, presentlie by the goodnesse of God established within this realme, and alloweth of the confession of the faith set downe by act of parlement the first yere of his maiesties reigne. Likewise his highnesse not onlie professeth the same in all sinceritie, but (praised be God) is come to that ripenesse of iudgement by reading and hearing the word of God, that his high-nesse is able to conuince and overthrow by the doctrine of the prophets and apostles the most learned of the contrarie sect. So that (as Plato affirmeth that common wealth to be counted happy wherein a philosopher reigne, or he that reigne is a philosopher) we maie much more esteeme this countrie of Scotland to be fortunate, wherein our king is a diuine, and whose hart is replenished with the knowledge of the heauenlie philosophie: for the comfort not onlie of his good subjects and friends in other countries but of them that professeth the gospell euerie where, he being a king of great wisdom, and by his birth right bozne to great possession; but much more his highnesse, vertue, godlinesse and learning, and daillie increase of all heauenlie sciences, doth promise and assure him of the mightie protection of God, and fauour of all them that feare his holie name.

In the second act his maiesties totall authoritie ouer all estates both spirituall and temporell is confirmed: which act some of malice, and some of ignorance doth traduce, as if his maiestie pretended to be called the head of the church, a name which his maiestie acknowledgeth to be proper and peculiar to the sonne of God the sauiour of the world, who is the head, and bestoweth life spirituall vpon the members of his mysticall bodie, and he hauing receiued the holie spirit in all abundance, maketh euerie one of the faithfull partakers thereof, according to the measure of faith bestowed vpon them, of the which number of the faithfull vnder the head Christ, his maiestie acknowledgeth himselfe to be a member baptised in his name, partaker of the misterie of the crosse and holie communion, and attending with the faithfull for the coming of the Lord and the finall resurrection of Gods elect. And notwithstanding his maiestie sutelie vnderstandeth by the scriptures, that he is the chiefe and principall member appointed by the lawe of God, to see God glorified, vice punished and vertue maintained within his realme: and the soueraigne iudgment of a godlie quietnesse & order in the common wealth, to appertene to his highnesse care and solicitude. Which power and authoritie of his highnesse, certeine ministers being called before his maiestie for their seditious and factious sermons in stirring vp the people to rebellion against their native king (by the instigation of seditious vniquiet spirits) would in no wise acknowledge but disclaime his maiesties authoritie as an incompetent iudge: and especiallie one called master Andrewe Spelaine of a salt and sterte humour, usurping the pulpit of S. andrews, without anie lawfull calling, and pruite at that time to certeine conspiracies attempted against his maiestie and crowne, went about in a sermon vpon a sundae, to inflame the hearts of the people by odious comparisons of his maiesties progenitors and counsell, albeit the dutie of a faithfull preacher of the gospell be rather to exhort the people to obedience of their native king, and not by popular sermons (which hath bene the euersion and decaye of great cities and common wealths, and hath greatlie in times past bred disquietnesse to the state thereby) to trouble and perturb the countrie. The said master Andrewe being called before his highnesse, presumptionlie answered that he would not be iudged by the king and counsell, because he had spoken the same in pulpit, which pulpit in effect he alleged to be exempted from the iudgement and correction of princes, as if that holie place sanctified to the word of God and to the breaking of the bread of life, might be anie colour to anie sedition in word or deed, against the lawfull authoritie, without punishment. Alwaies his maiestie (being of himselfe a most gracious prince) was not willing to haue be sed ante rigor against the said matter Andrieu, if he had humble submitted himselfe, acknowledged his offence, and craved pardon: who notwithstanding affaile of his owne guiltinesse, being psume to diuers conspirators before, fled out of the realme, whose nightlie & presumptuous refusing of his highnesse iudgement, was the occasion of the making of this second act: that is, that none should decline from his highnesse authoritie, in respect that the common pouer be heareth Ex malis moribus bona leges nata sunt, which is, that all euill maners good lawes proceed. And in verie deed it wanteth not ane right intolerable arrogancie in anie subiect called before his p'fence, professing and authorising the same truth, to disclaime his authoritie, neither do the prophets, apostles, or others (conduced by the spirit of God) minister the like example: for it is a great error to asserme (as manie do) that princes and magistrats haue onlie power to take order in ciuill affaires, and that ecclesiasticall matters do onelie belong to the ministerie.

By which meanes the pope of Rome hath exempted himselfe and his cleargie from all iudgment of princes, and he made himselfe to be iudge of iudges, and to be iudged of no man: whereas by the contrarie, not onelie by the example of the godlie gouernors, iudges, and kings of the old testament; but also by the new testament, and the whole historie of the primitive church, in which the emperors being iudges ouer the bishops of Rome, depofed them from their seats, appointed iudges to decide and determine causes ecclesiasticall, and challenge innocent men, as Athanasius from the determination of the councell holden at Cirus, and by infinit god reasons which shall be set downe by the grace of God in an other fenerall worke, and shall be sufficientlie proued and verified. But this appereth at this present to be an vntimelie and vnprofitable question, which hath no ground vpon their part, but of the preposterous imitation of the pretended iurisdiction of the pope of Rome. For if there were anie question of this land of heresie, whereby the p'found mysteries of the scriptures behoued to be searched forth, his maiestie would vse the same remedie (as most expedient) which the most godlie emperors haue vfed: and his maiestie following their example would allowe the councell of learned pastozs, that by conference of scriptures the veritie might be opened, and heresie repressed.

But God be thanked, we haue no such controversies in this land, neither hath anie heresie taken ante deepe root in the countrie; but that certeine of the ministerie, joining themselves to rebels haue trauelled to disquiet the state with such questions, that the people might imbrace anie sinister opinion of his maiesties vpright proceedings, and factions might be nourished and interteined in the countrie: neither is it his maiesties meaning nor intention in anie sort, to take awaie the lawfull and ordinarie iudgement in the church, whereby discipline and good order might decaye; but rather to preserve, increase, and mainteine the same. And as there is in this realme, iustices, conestables, shiriffes, prouosts, bailiffes, and other iudges in temporall matters: so his maiestie alloweth that all things might be done in order, and a godlie quietnes may be preserved in the whole estate; the synodall assemblies by the bishops, or commissioners, where the place was vfed to be conuenient, twise in the yeare, to haue the ordinarie triall of matters belonging to the ministerie and their estate: alwaies reseruing to his highnesse, that if they, or anie of them do amisse, neglect their dutie, disquiet the estate, or offend in anie such manner and sort, that they in no waies pretend anie immunitie, priuilege, and exemption, which onelie was intended by the popes of Rome, to tread vnder foot the scepter of princes, and to establish an ecclesiasticall tyrannie within this countrie; under pretence of new invented presbyteres, which neither should answer to the king nor bishop under his maiestie: but should haue such infinit iurisdiction, as neither the law of God nor man can tollerat; which is onelie his maiesties intention to repress, and not to take awaie anie godlie or due order in the church, as hereafter shall appeare.

The third act of his maiesties foresaid parlement dischargeth all iudgements ecclesiasticall, and all assemblies which are not allowed by his maiesties parlement. Which act speciallie concerneth the removing and discharging of that forme, intended in this land, called the presbyterie: wherein a number of ministers of certeine precincts and bounds, accounting themselves to be equall, without anie difference, and gathering vnto them certeine gentlemen and others of his maiesties subiects, vsurpe the whole ecclesiasticall iurisdiction, & altereth the lawes at their owne pleasure, without the knowledge or approbation of the king, or of the estate: a forme of doing without example of anie nation, subiect to a christian prince. The perill thereof did so increase, that in case it had not bene repressed in due season, & forbidden by his maiesties lawes, the same had troubled the whole countrie: and being tried by his highnesse to be the ouerthrow of his maiesties estate, the decaye of his crowne, and a readie introduction to Anabaptistrie, and popular confusion in all estates; his maiestie hath giuen commandement against the same. And that the reader may knowe the danger thereof by manie inconueniences, which thereby inueth in this land, I will onelie set downe one, whereby they may vnderstand what perill was in the rest.

The ambassadoz of France, returning home into his countrie, commanded the prouosts, bailiffes, and conestable of Edinburgh to make him a banquet, that he might be receiued honozable according to the amitie of ancient times betwene the two nations. This commandement was giuen on the Saturday by his highnesse, and the banquet appointed to be on the mondaie. A number of the foresaid pretended presbyterie vnderstanding thereof, assembled themselves on the sundae in the morning, and presumptuously determined & agreed, that the ministers of Edinburgh should proclaime a fasting vpon the same mondaie; where their fenerall ministers one after another made three fenerall sermons, and inuadines against the prouosts, bailiffes, and counsell for the time, and the noble men in the countrie, who repaired to the banquet at his maiesties command. The foresaid presbyterie called and persuaded them, and scarcelie by his maiesties authoritie could be withhelden from excommunicating the magistrats and noble men, for obteing onelie his highnesse lawfull command; which the law of all countries called Im gentium, requiries towards ambassadors of foreign countries. And not onelie in this, but innumerable other things, their commandement was proclaimed directlie, vnder the paine of excommunication to the kings maiestie and his lawes.

Which forme of proceeding ingendered nothing but disquietnesse, sedition, and trouble: as may manifestlie appeare, in that the especiall authors of the inuenting, promoting, and assisting of the foresaid pretended presbyterie, hath joined themselves with his maiesties rebels; and being forth of the realme, in respect of their guiltinesse, hath discouered what malicious practises was deuised amongst them, if God had not in tyme prouided remedie. The

The other forme of iudgement, which his maiestie hath discharged, is the generall assemble of the whole cleargie in the realme: under pretense whereof a number of ministers from sundrie presbyteries did assemble, with some gentlemen of the countrie; whereof, some for that time (malcontents of the state) sought that colour as fauourers of the ministerie, by the which they haue practised manie enterprises in the realme; where there was no certaine law in ecclesiasticall affaires, but all depended vpon the said generall convention, where the laws of the church were alterable after the number of voices, which for the most part succeded into the most vnlearned of the multitude.

This generall assemble amongst other things, did appoint and agree with his maiesties regents in his minoritie, that the estate of bishops should be maintained and authorized, as is registered in the booke of counsell, and subscribed by the commissioners for the time. Which order was obserued manie yeares, and bishops by their consents appointed to their diocesse, untill within this late time, in assemblies holden at Dundee, and Glasgowe, respecting the foresaid ministers and assemblies, toke vpon them contrarie to their owne handwritting, to discharge the estate, and to declare the same to be vnlawfull in their pretended manner. And there commanded the bishops of the countrie, to demit and leave their offices and iurisdictions, and that in no wise they should passe to the kings counsell or parliament, without commission obtained from their assemble: that they should confirme nothing in parlement and counsell, but according to their acts and instructions. And further, they directed their commissioners to the kings maiestie, commanding him and the counsell vnder paine of the censures of the church (whereby they vnderstood excommunication) to appoint no bishop in time to come, because they had concluded that estate to be vnlawfull. And notwithstanding, that which they would haue effected in the bishops, they purposed to erect in themselves, desiring that such commissioners as they should send to parlement and counsell, might be authorized in place of the estate: whereby it should haue come to passe, that whereas now his maiestie may select the most godlie, learned, wise, and experienced of the ministerie, to be on his maiesties estate, his highnesse should haue bene by that meanes compelled to accept such as the multitude, by an od consent of the most vnlearned, should haue appointed, which could not tend but to the ouerthrow of the realme.

After they had discharged bishops, they agreed to haue superintendents, commissioners, and visitors: but in the end they decerned that there should be no difference amongst the ministers, and imagined that new forme of presbyterie, whereof we haue spoken before. Neither was there anie other appearance that they should haue staied from such baillie alterations in the common-wealth, which could not but continually be disputed, where the law of conscience, which they maintained by the sword of cursing, was subject to such mutations, at the arbitrement of a number, whereof the most part had not greatlie tasted of learning. At once the foresaid assemble was accustomed, not onelie to prescribe the law to the king and estate, but also did at certaine times appoint generall fastings through out the realme; especiallie, when some factioner in the countrie was to moue anie great enterprize. For at the fast, all the ministers were commanded by the assemble to sing one song, and to crie out vpon the abuses (as they termed it) of the court and estate for the time: whereby is most certaine great alterations to haue ensued in this land; while at the good pleasure of God, and his blessing towards his maiestie, the pretense of the last fast was discovered, and his highnesse deliuered from such attempts, whereby his maiestie hath bene iustlie moued to discharge such conventions, which might import to preiudiciallie to his estate.

But especiallie his maiestie had no small occasion, whereas the same assemble being met at Edinburgh, did authorize and auow the fact perpetrated at Ruthwen, in the taking of his highnesse most noble person. The which deed notwithstanding, with the aduise of his estates in parlement accounted to be treason; the said assemble esteeming their iudgement to be the soueraigne iudgement of the realme, hath not onlie approved the same, but also ordeined all them to be excommunicate that would not subscribe and allow the same. So the acts of this assemble, and the lawes of the estate directed, twined in ciuill matter, with the which the assemble should not haue medled, it behoued his highnesse either to discharge himselfe of the crowne, or the ministerie of the forme of the assemble, which in deed of it selfe, without the kings maiesties licence & approbation, could not be lawfull, like as generall counsels at no time could assemble, without the commandement of the emperor for the time. And our king hath no lesse power within his owne realme than anie of them had in the empire. Vea the bishop of S. Andrews had not in time of poperie, power to conuent the bishops and clergie out of their owne diocesse, without licence giuen before by his highnes most noble progenitors of good memorie, and the causes thereof intimate and allowed.

Notwithstanding that his maiesties intention and meaning maie fullie be vnderstood, it is his highnesse will, that the bishop or commissioners of anie diocesse or prouince, or part thereof, shall at their visitation appoint in euerie parish, according to the greatnesse thereof, some honest, vertuous, and discreet men, to aid and assist the minister, and to haue the ouersight and censure of the maners and behauior of the people of that parish. And if there be anie notable offense, worthe of punishment, that the bishop and commissioners be aduertised thereof, who shall haue an officer of armes to be assistant for the punishment of vice and execrations to follow therevpon: that they who contemne the godlie and lawfull order of the church, maie find by experience his maiesties displeasure, and be punished according to their desertings. And further, his maiestie vpon necessarie occasions which shall fall forth, by diuers maners of waies amongst the clergie, vpon humble supplication made to his highnesse, will not refuse to grant them licence to assist the bishops, commissioners, and some of the most vertuous, learned and godlie of their diocesse, where such ecclesiasticall matters, as appertaine to the vniuersitie of doctrine and conuersation of a godlie order in the church, maie be intreated and concluded in his maiesties owne presence, or some of his honorable counsell, who shall assist for the time: where if necessitie so require, a publike fast throughout the whole realme maie be commanded, and by his maiesties authoritie proclaimed, to auoid the imminent displeasure and danger of the wrath of the Lords iudgements, which is the right end of publike humilitie, and not vnder pretense thereof to couer such enterprises, as haue heretofore disquieted and troubled the peace of this common wealth.

The twentieth act ratifieth and approueth, and establisheth the estate of the bishops within the realme, to haue the ouersight and iurisdiction, euerie one in their owne diocesse: which forme of gouernement, and and rule in ecclesiasticall affaires, hath not onlie continued in the church from the daies of the apostles, by continuall succession of time, and manie martyrs in that calling shed their blood for the truth: but also this realme embraced and receiued the christian religion, the same estate hath bene maintained, to the welfare of the church, and quietnes of the realme without anie interruption, untill within these few yeares, some curious and busie men haue praised to induce into the ministerie an equalitie in all things, aswell concerning the preaching of the word, administration of the sacraments, as likewise in discipline, order, and policie. The which confusion his maiestie finding by most dangerous experience, to haue bene the mother and nurse of great factions, seditions, and troubles within this realme, hath with aduise of his highnes estates, aduisedlie concluded, the said pretended partie in discipline, orders and policie in the church, to be no longer to be tolerated in his countrie, but the solicitude & care of all churches in one diocesse to apperteyne to the bishop and commissioners therof, who shall be answerable to God, and his maiestie, and estates, for the right administration and discharge of the office of particular ministers, within the bounds of his iurisdiction. For as it becommeth his maiestie, as Eusebius writeth of Constantinus the great, to be a bishop of bishops, and vniuersall bishop within his realme, in so far as his maiestie should appoint euerie one to discharge his duetie: which his highnesse cannot, his countrie being large and great, take him to euerie minister that shall offend and transgresse against dutie, or quarrell with the whole number of the ministerie: but it behoueth his maiestie to haue bishops & ouerscers vnder him which may be answerable for such bounds, as the law and order of the countrie hath limited and appointed to euerie one of them. And that they hauing access to his maiesties parliament and counsell, may intercede for the rest of the brethren of the ministerie, propound their graces vnto his highnesse and estates, and receiue his maiesties sauourable answer therein. The which forme doth preserve a goodlie quietnesse, vnitie, concord and peace in the estate, and one vni forme order in the church. As contrariwise, the pretended equalitie diuiderth the same, and vnder the pretense of equalitie maketh the same of the most craftie and subtil dealers to be aduanced and enriched: and in pretending of partie, to seeke nothing but their owne ambition and aduancement aboue the rest of the simple sort.

And notwithstanding that his maiestie hath re-established the said estate, it is not his highnesse will and intent, that the foresaid bishop shall haue such full power as to doe within his diocesse what he pleaseth, for his maiestie cannot allot of anie popular confusion, wherein (as the proverbe saith) Nulla tyrannis equiparanda est tyrannidi multitudinis, that is: No tyrannie can be compared to the tyrannie of a multitude, hauing commandement and power in his hands: so on the other part his maiesties will is, that the bishops authoritie in anie graue matter, be limited to the counsell of wise men of the most ancient, wise, and goodlie persons of his diocesse, selected out of the whole synodall assemble of the prouince: by whose aduise, or at the least the most part thereof, the weightie affaires of the church may be gouerned to the glorie of God, and quietnes of the realme. Further it is his highnesse will and commandement, that their bishops and commissioners shoulde in the yeare, to wit, ten daies after Easter, and the first of September, hold their synodall assemblies in euerie diocesse, for the keeping of god orders therein: and if anie be stubborne, or contemne within their bounds the good order of the church, that it may be declared vnto his maiestie, and punished to the example of others, according to their desertings. Neither is it his maiesties meaning or intent, that such bishops or commissioners as shall be appointed, shall receiue their onelie and full commission of his maiestie without admission ordinarie, by such as are appointed to that effect in the church: but hauing his highnesse nomination, presentation, and commendation as lawfull and onlie patrons, they to be tried and examined, that their qualities are such as they are able to discharge their cure and office. And if it shall happen anie of the said bishops or commissioners, to be negligent in their office, or to be slanderous or offensive in their behauior, life, and maners, in time to come, it is not his highnesse will, that they shall be exempted from correction, notwithstanding anie priuilege of his highnesse estate, counsell or parliament: but their labors, trauels, diligence and behauiors, to be tried in the generall assemble, not consisting of a confused multitude, as it was before; but of such worshipfull persons as is heretofore prescribed in his highnesse presence, or his deputies to that effect.

Lastlie his maiestie giueth commission to the said bishops or commissioners at their visitations, to consider in what part of the countrie, the enterprise, or interpretation of the scripture, by conference of a certeine number of the ministerie within those bounds, may be most commodiouslie once in euerie fixtē daies. For as his maiestie inhibits all vniuersall meetings, that may ingender trouble and contention in the countrie: so his maiestie is well affected to see the ministerie increase in knowledge and vnderstanding, and by all means to fortifie and aduance the same. Wherein his highnesse commandement is, that a graue, wise, and sage man shall be appointed president, who may haue the ouersight of these bounds, and be answerable therefore to the bishop, his counsell and synod; and he to be respected reasonable for his paines, at the modification of stipends: that all things may be orderly done in the church, peace & quietnesse maintained in the realme, and we deliuered from apparant plagues, and the blessings of God continued to the comfort of our posteritie. And in the meane time his highnesse inhibits & expresse forbids vnder the paines conteyned in his maiesties acts of parliament, & all other pains arbitrable at his maiesties sight & counsell, that no minister take in hand to assemble themselves for the foresaid cause, without the appointment and order taken by the said bishops or commissioners, whereby his highnesse may be certeinly informed, that the foresaid ministers assemble not, to meddle with anie ciuill matters, or affaires of estate, as was accustomed before; but onelie to profit in the knowledge of the word, and to be comforted one by another in the administration of their spirituall office: which his highnesse wisheth them faithfully to discharge, and then to call to God, that his maiestie may in a prosperous reigne enioie good and long life, and continuall increase in the feare of the almighty.

Besides which, the king at the end of this his intention, did further articulate his intention into sundrie heads as here followeth.

The kings intention drawne into certeine articles, and published in print.

As maiesties intention is, by the grace of God, to mainteine the true and sincere profession of the gospel, and preaching thereof within his realme.

2 His maiesties intention is, to correct and punish such as seditiously abuse the truth, and factiously applie or rather betwaine the text of the scripture to the disquieting of the state and disturbing of the commonwealth, or impairing of his highnesse and counsels honour.

3 His maiesties intention is, if any question of faith and doctrine arise, to conuocate the most learned, godlie, wise, and experienced pastors, that by conference of scriptures the veritie may be tried, and all heresie and schisme by that means expressed.

4 His maiesties intention is, that for the keeping of good order in euery paroch, certeine ouerscers to the good behauiour of the rest, be appointed at the visitation of the bishop or visitour, who shall haue his maiesties authoritie, and officers of armes concurring for the punishment of vice.

5 His maiesties intention is, to mainteine the exercise of prophesie for the increase and continuing of knowledge amongst the ministerie: in which a wise and a graue man selected by the bishop or commissioner at the synodall assemblie, shall render account of the administration of those bounds, where the exercise is holden, for which cause some respect of liuing shall be had vnto him, who susteins that burden.

6 His maiesties intention is, not to derogate from the ordinarie iudgement of matters of the church by the ordinaries bishops, their counsels and synods: but if any of them doe amisse, and abuse their calling, to take order for correcting, amending and punishing thereof.

7 His maiesties intention is, not to hinder or staie any godlie or solid order, grounded vpon the word of God, and order of the primitive church, but that the ministers of the word meddle themselves onelie with their owne calling, and iudge not fearfullie of the estate.

8 It is his maiesties intention, that the presbyteries consisting of manie ministers and gentlemen, at handwar or otherwaies, be not further tollerat in his realme: but the exercise of iurisdiction of all churches to be in the hand of the bishop or commissioner, and their counsels and synods.

9 It is his maiesties intention, that the bishops or commissioners assemble not any generall assemblie out of the whole realme, without his maiesties knowledge and licence obtained therevnto: which vpon supplication his highnesse will not denie, that an vniforme order may be obserued in the whole realme, and the bishops and their diligences there tried and examined, and the complaints of euery particular heard and discusled.

10 It is his maiesties intention to assist this assemblie himselfe, or by a noble man of his counsell, his highnesse deputie.

11 It is his maiesties intention, that when any paroch findeth necessitie of any fast, they informe the occasion to the bishop or commissioner and their counsell, that they may vnderstand the cause to be lawfull; as likewise the bishop of the diocesse finding lawfull occasion, may within the same, with his counsell prescribe any publicke humilitation.

12 It is his maiesties intention, that a generall fast throughout the whole realme, shall not be proclaimed but by his maiesties commandement, or by a generall counsell, wher in his maiestie or his highnesse deputie is present.

13 It is his highnesse intention, that the bishops in the realme in euery diocesse with their counsell proceed into the ecclesiasticall gouernement, but as is said with a counsell, that both tyrannie and confusion may be auoided in the church.

14 It is his maiesties intention, that commissioners be directed vniuersallie throughout the whole realme, to establish a godlie order, and that his maiesties commissioners take order presently for the translation of such ministers, whose travels they e, seeme may more conuenientlie and profitablie serue in an other place.

These things was the king saue to publish, to staie the euill report of such as went about to touch him for the breach of the christian order in religion, which being nothing but that which seemeth answerable to naturall sense & princelie maiestie, should neither by malice haue moued, nor for colour of religion procured any beyond the warrant of the word of God, or the due tie of naturall allegiance to resist the kinglie ordinance, or to lift by their sword or word against him, who being a god in earth, presenteth the maiestie of the God of heauen. But teaching the discourse of these things to preachers, to whom it belongeth to instruct vs in our dutie to God, to our prince, & to our neighbours, we will turne againe to the other following occurrents of Scotland. And yet before we speake any thing of those matters, sith I haue in this place as well as in manie other spoken of parlements & acts of parlement, I thinke it not amisse to set downe somewhat collected out of authors touching their manner and order of parlement, and that the rather because the same consisteth of three estates, and the princes confirmation as our parlement doth, from whence it seemeth to me that they haue set their light. Touching which, Lesleus in his Scottish historie lib. 1. pag. 75. vnder the title of Leges Scotorum, writeth in this sort. Qui vero seculi negotijs sese implicantes in ecclesiasticorum album non referuntur, legibus, quas reges descripserunt, aut regum voce confirmatas, tres regni ordines sanxerunt, continentur, has partim Latino, partim Scotico sermone confirmatas, regni municipales leges vocamus: libro qui leges Latine scriptas continet, titulus (regiam maiestatem) præfigitur, quod ab illis vocibus libri exordium ducatur. Reliquis legum libris, comitiis (quæ populari sermone parliamenta dicimus) acta inscribuntur. Quanquam hæc aduertendum, nos ita lege municipaliter teneri, ut si causa multis controuersijs implicata (quod sæpe fit) incidat quæ legibus nostratibus non possit dirimi, statim quicquid ad hanc controuersiam decidendam necessarium censetur, ex ciuilibus Romanorum libris promatur. Sed si quis legum nostrarum originem velit conquistare inuestigare, intelligat potestatem hæc ferendi antiquandique trium ordinum suffragijs liberè in publico latis regis assensu confirmatis esse positam. On which parlements so assembled, consisting of the three estates, & the princes confirming voice (in the beginning whereof the king goeth to the place where that assemblie is made, to keepe such parlement attired in his regall garments, with the sword and other ornaments, the ensignes of his kingdome and knightlie authoritie, eared before him, attended on with all his nobilitie and cleargie) those common people with maiesties giue such be names as seemeth best fitting to themselves, and is most answerable to the nature & order of that parlement, as we also doe here in England, whereof I could produce manie examples of both nations, which at this time I will forbear, and onelie set downe one proofe (as well of England as Scotland) to confirme the same, least in passing it ouer without some example thereof, I might make some defect of knowledge consisting in matters of this kind, without asse sound matter. Wherefore I say, that as in England in the yeare of our redemption one thousand two hundred fiftie and eight, being the two and fortieth yeare of the reigne of king Henry the sixth, the parlement

ment held at Oxford by the lords against the king, was called Parlamentum infamum, because manie things were there intruded which turned to the death of diuerse noble men. So the Scots in like manner benamied a parliament, in the yeare of April 1556, (being the fourteenth yeare of Marie the notie imprisoned quene of Scotland) and called the same a running parliament, because there were manie intermissions and remissions during the continuance therof, as appeareth by Lelous in these words.

A q̄ste frequēti habita fuit Edinburgi trium ordinum comitis, in quibus domini Brachp̄m̄, Grangior, Delacour, & alij magni, quorum bona a gubernatore publicata fuerunt, singularem regni Francie commendatione dignam, fama atque bonis rebus fuit. Hic vero comitis, quod intermissa potius quam omnia, quasi continuarentur, nomen a iudice acciperent, ut currentia dicerentur. Thus much being said about their parliaments, let vs againe fall with our pen into the other matters of Scotland.

About this time an ambassage was sent out of England into Scotland, for the concluding of a peace betwene both nations; the contents whereof, the king (opening unto the lords and gentlemen assembled in parliament, and holden at saint Andrews) did vnto them this speech following.

The kings speech to the estates, concerning a league in religion with England.

WHO causis my lordis and ye all of the estates have moued me to send for you at this time to craue your aduises towards them, quharof sith the one is generall & the other particular, I will begin at the generall as the matter of greatest weicht. Amongst all the benefitis that God doth bestow vpon his elect and church, the triall and sifting of the god chosin from the bad hypocritis, is one of the most speciall, quibich he hath vsed in all ages for the separation of thame, althowh for that to lang companie of the wicked doth corrupt the goodlie, as also that their separation is a taken in this earth, of Godis lūe towards them, quibich triall he doth notio chesellie vs, for that the number of the wicked doth abound in these latter daies, quherin God doth permit the diuell most to rage. For quhat greater triall of the faithfull can there be, than the confederating togidder of all the basard christians, I meane the papists in a league quibich they terme holie, albeit most unholie in varie truth, for the subuersion of the true religion in all realmes throughout the quhole warld. This is a matter so manifest and notorious to you all, euen by the report of the smallest merchantis that traueill, as it doth dilate the felle, thought I were silent.

This leagues quhome of I speake, are composed of Frenchmen and Hispaniols, assisted with the king of Spaine and the papes monie, solemlie stroue to performe the foresaid enterpryse before they leaue armies: the perswasions quherof we ought to resist for thre causes (to wit) for conscience, honor, and loue of selfis. For gif they maie attaine to their purpose (as God forbid) either will they destroye or cast out vs, our vills and childre in, & quhat thence we possesse, gif we remaine constant; either else must we render Christ Jesus, and suffer our soules to be the most nablest part of man to be bound with the bonds of idolatrie, and our bodies to be vnto at their insatiable pleasures. But sith the loue of our selfis and our honour cannot pervert the one, and that our consciences and the remembrance vnto God, cannot suffer the other: I craue my lordis; but first & soundest opinions and aduises quhat ye thinke fittest to be vsed for the remedie hereof. But gif ye desire to see how my opinion, it is this in fere locutis; that as simple christian princis have already counselled me, our contraleague shalbe made, not aneie intermis, but in effect holie, for the joining togidder all true christian princis to defend themselves, in case of other troubles. A thing hurtfull to none, profitable for felicitie acceptable to God, and vnto in the sight of the world. By this meanes shall our consciences, honours, and liues be preserved, and God and his religion glorified and aduanced.

And sith the quene of England is not anie a true christian, but also merest to wit to be in neighbourly confanguinitie and goodwill, I thinke it writt in mine opinion, that it be our league first and most aduantageous with hir; for quibich cause I have made and set before a forme of act to be subscribed by you all, quherin ye promise to ratifie and approve in parliament, quhatsoeuer articles I, or anie in my name shall conclude with the quene of England, or anie in hir name, for the making and effecting of the foresaid league. But for that the act it selfe will more ample informe you, it shalbe presently read in all your audiēcies.

Upon this speech the lords being of diuerse opinions, some willing to embrace the league with England, and some desirous to leave it, and to loine in amitie with France according to the most ancientest leagues, which haue bene established betwene them and the Scots by most of their former kings (whereof the first was Athaus, who entering league with Charles the great, had a token of confirmation on therof, which was the flower delices added to the arms of Scotland) there was nothing done in that conuention. After which, the banished lords of Scotland remaining in England, entered their countrie: and after some abode there made, vpon diuerse meetings & consultations, at last gathered their powers, and on the first of Nouember they pitched their tents, placed there as it had bene a new towne, to the great terror of their enemies within Scotland: determining for the cause of their comming this proclamation following.

The proclamation published by the nobilitie of Scotland, conteining the causes of their repairing towards the towne of sterling to the kings maiestie, the second daie of Nouember.

WHERAS the kings maiestie our soveraigne good, naturall, and vertuous education is notio plainelie understood to have bene abused, and his roiall qualities giuen to him by the almightie God (which caused his fame far above the capacitie of his yeares to be magnified, and worthilie praised, to the great comfort of all his subiects) hath bene these yeares past obscured by the craft & subtiltie of some lewd and wicked persons of no desert or worthinesse, and for the most part of base linage, not borne to one foot breadth of land, yet of marvellous aspiring tozongs and cruell inclination; who vnder colour of friendship and blood creeping in about his maiestie, and seeking onelie their owne particular profit and promotion, shaking off (as it were) not onelie all christian and charitable nature: but euen the generall points and offices of humantie vnto amongst most barbarous people, without feare of God or man, as subtill fiers and bloudie tooles, by working of lawes and other deceitfull practises, both so wasted, tozme in peccēs, and deuoured the whole bodie of this afflicted commonwealth, that of the whole ancient forme of iustice and policie receiued of our ancestors, remaineth nothing, neither in spirituall or temporall estate;

estate;

State; but the naked shaddo & counterfetted maske thereof to our souveraignes high dishonour, our opprobrie (who are a part of his nobilitie) and heauie greefe of all good men throughout the realme. It is euidentlie knowne that iustice and quietnesse was in the realme, what heartie loue betwixt his maiestie and his subjects; what beautifull countenance the church of God had, what daikie hope of increase; what expectation was of his highnesse in farrren nations, before the arrivall of Degenie, afterwards called the duke of Lennox, and the entring in credit of James Stewart, and cojonell Stewart with their unhapie companions. But what hath succeeded since, no true Scottis hart can remember without extreame dolour: for there is no part or corner within the land at this time peaceable or quiet, but all replentished with particular enimities, and cruell reuenges without punishment.

It is also well knowne, that whereas the wisest of his maiesties most noble progenitors labored by clemencie, not by crueltie to possesse the hearts of their subjects, & to keepe the strengths of their realms in their owne hands (thereby meaning the better to preserve themselves against such inconveniences, as many princes of that land misgouverned, and lead by peruerse counsell haue bene subiect vnto) that the foresaid abusours had depriued his maiestie both of the one and the other so far as in them lye. For the chiefe strengths of the realme are in Arrane his hands, who by agging of his pedigree by descent from duke Goddarche (one that was beheaded for his treason against his souereigne) was not ashamed to saie (meaning of himselfe) Here stands the person of king James the seventh. And to the end that the hearts of the people might be alienated from his highnesse, and so (as appeareth) his maiestie made unable to punish them, if at any time hereafter he should perceiue their false and treasonable doings, what can be added more than these said seditious hath already done in that behalfe, seeing under his maiesties name and authoritie, such parcialitie is vsed in all matters, such extortion with crueltie, and incredible dissimulation throughout the whole land, that were it not of his good subiects (upon the experience of his mild & calme gouernement before these lewd men about him) clerelie vnderstood that the causes of all these misorders ought to be imputed vnto them, & not to himselfe, they had long agoone by vniuersall male-contentment of the people (procuring from the causes aforesaid) procured a great distraction of the kings leges hearts, and had cast his maiesties honor, crowne, and estate in marvellous danger; whereas now (blessed be God) all his true subiects are certeinlie perswaded, that if the said lewd persons could be separated from his maiestie, he would returne againe to exercise his former clemencie and towardnes in euerie respect, which hath bene these pceres past maruellouslie eclipsed by the craft of those treasonable persons aforesaid, who not onelie haue sought & seek for their particular commoditie, the destruction of certein seuerall persons; but euen (as it appeareth) haue conspired against the whole bodie of the realme, in so much as there is no estate of the land free from their persecutions.

The worst & chief and most ancient of the barons and nobilitie (namelie such as haue giuen best proofe of their forwardnes in true religion, and fidelitie to their souereigne) are by parcialitie, and wresting of lawes, without mercie either executed, conspired, imprisoned, banished, or at the least debarred his maiesties presence, against the ministerie, scholes, and alergie, acts and proclamations published, inhibiting their presbyteries, assemblies, and other exercises, priuileges, and immunities ratified by parliaments, proceedings, or at the least by laudable rites some permitted euer since the first reformation of religion within this land; and without the which the puritie of doctrine, and right forme of the ecclesiasticall discipline cannot long continue: as being the onelie meanes to trie & examine the liues, maners, and knowledge of euerie person, and to reforme the same if need requite. With this the most learned, and of most vnspotted liues of that number, are either compelled for safetie of their liues and consciences to abandon their countrie, or else inhibited to preach, or depriued of their stipends, Jesuits, seminarie priests, and such as be knowne practisers in diuers nations for the execution of the bloody council of Trent are interteined, and in great estimation; yea some indurated papists in session, to occupie the places from the which the most godlie & faithfull senators haue bene by them delected. An euident presage of the ouerthrow of true religion. And concerning the estate of burrowes, by intrusion of such magistrats to rule aboue them, as neither are comburgeses, nor apt to discharge them selues of such offices; but men elected to applause and to consent to the appetite of the seditious aforesaid, these priuileges & ancient liberties are so preiudiced, that without timelie remedie, that estate (sometime a great ornament of the land) must needs suddenly decaye. So as these three pillars (whereby the king & common wealth should be preserved & upheld) being wasted & vndermined in maner aboue written, what can be expected but vniuersall ruine and ouerthrow of the whole bodie of the estate; except God of his mercie prevent the same. Besides all these, the foresaid abusours not resting content with the enormities aboue exprest, haue practised, and daikie do practise to turne the happy amitie & loue, which now a good space hath stood betwene the inhabitants of the whole Ile in open hostilitie & hatred, without respect of neighborhood or kindred, standing betwene the two princes, or regard had to the benefits that his maiestie of England hath bestowed upon the king our souereigne, and his whole countrie, first by planting of true religion within this realme, and next by preserving his maiestie, when as in his minoritie he could not take in hand or enterprize for himselfe.

To this effect they openlie delt with such persons as by all meanes sought his maiesties destruction, as by the confession of sundrie his maiesties rebels latelie executed in England is made manifest. But how soone they perceiued open danger to arise, by open dealing with his enemies, then fraudfullie to flude his maiestie, they haue pretended these monthes past, in great friendship and kindnesse, promising largelie in that behalfe, and offering to capitulat a bond offensive and defensive to stand perpetuallie. But in the end, notwithstanding all these liberall promises, the effects by experience declare nothing to haue bene in their minds but falshood & crueltie, as by the late murder of the lord Russell is manifest to the whole world, who being a yong noble man, for his birth and qualittes verie honorable and vertuous, and of great expectation, & for his earnest zeale to religion, and good affection to the king our souereigne, and to all Scottis men in generall, one that merited great praise, loue and commendation: yet he was murdered in most odious and treasonable maner, euen when as greatest kindnes and friendship was pretended; which cannot but produce marvellous suspition and slander, as well against the king our souereigne, as against the whole countrie, to his maiesties great dishonour, and discredit of his innocent subiects, if condigne iustice be not ministered vpon the authors, and the executors of this horrible crime aforesaid.

It self, which is most of all, and necessarie craueth present reformation, the foresaid abusers couer all these enormities with his maiesties name and authority, thereby thinking to excuse themselves, and to laie the burden on him. And therefore, as it cannot be but verie slanderous and dangerous to his maiestie, if such licentious persons (who hath already made shipwacks of all honestie) be suffered to remaine in his compaignie: so is it shamefull to be reported in other nations, that such a few number of beggerlie fellows replenished with all vice, should ertinguishe the beautie of the nobilitie, haue empire ouer the whole countrie, and keepe his maiestie thral to authority by his roiall power their abhominable and execrable facts. For the causes aforesaid, and manie others that might be iustlie alleged, we of his maiesties nobilitie here present, in the feare of God and our soveraignes obedience, being through Gods free mercie called to be professors of the blessed euangell, and bozne counsellors to his highnesse our soueraigne, bound in dutie not onelie to hazard, render and renounce our liues, lands, and goods (if need be) for the same euangell and true religion, but also in conscience charged to be carefull of his maiesties welfare, honoz, and reputation, and to procure to our abilitie, peace and quietnesse to him and his realme, hauing our lands and heritages for that effect, holden of his maiesties most noble progenitozs of worthie memorie.

In consideration of which great enormities and tyrannies, hauing conuened our selues together for redress and reformation of the same, seeing the suffering thereof hath already wounded the estate of true religion, dishonored his maiestie, disturbed the whole realme, and had almost disioined aswell the hearts of the princes as of the subiects of the two nations: we thinke it therefore high time, and we are in dutie and conscience (all doubt and perill set apart) to procure the separation and thrusting awaie of the said desperat and enoyned persons from about his maiestie, that his highnesse being restored to his former libertie, maiestie, peaceable, and wiselie gouerne his subiects and realme, by aduise of graue, modest, and indifferent counsellors; onelie respecting his maiesties suertie and preservation, to the end that the afflicted church within this land maie be comforted, and all acts latelie made in prejudice of the same, maie be solemnlie cancelled, and for euer aduolled, his maiestie restored to his former libertie, the bodie of his commonwealth (by punishing of vice cheselie vpon the authors of these late misorders, and maintenance of vertue) maie be once discharged of the heauie oppressions and iniuries that they haue with no small græfe so long sustained, and the happy amitie with England reestablished and conserued, to the high glorie of God, honoz of the king our soueraigne, and vniuersall contentment of all good men euerie where. In prosecution thereof, we protest before God and his holie angels, we shall neither spare our liues, lands, nor goods, but frankelie hazard and expend the same as need craveth, vntill the said abusers be either apprehended or presented to iustice, to suffer for their demerits; or else (if they cannot be found out) till they be debarred from his maiesties compaignie, and expelled the realme.

Wherefore we command and charge (in our soueraignes lords name) all and sundrie his subiects, as well to burrow as to land, to fortifie and assist this goodlie enterpryse, and to concurre with vs to that effect, as they will giue testimonie of their affection to the aduancement of true religion, his maiesties suertie and welfare, and the publike quietnesse of the whole realme; certifieng all and sundrie that with attempt any thing to the contrarie, or will not take one fold and plaine part with vs, we will repute them as partakers of all vice and iniquitie, authors of the treasonable conspiratozs aforesaid, and enemies of true religion, to his maiestie and his authority, and to the publike quietnesse betwixt the two realmes, & will vse them in bodie and goods accordingly. And that all iustices as well lords of sessions as iurists, commissioners, and other inferior iudges sit and administer iustice to the furtherance thereof, according to the laws of the realme, as they will answer vpon their allegiance and bittermost perill, with certification of the disobeioz, as is aforesaid.

The assemble of the nobilitie and the proclamation thus knowne, diuerse matters passed betwixt the king and the lords, as petitions to and fro made and exhibited, with grants therevnto according: and to conclude, much congratulation was made for returne into their countrie of Scotland. In December there was a parlement called at Lithgo, at what time the earle of Arrane was displaced from his earldome, and (if I erre not) of fice of chancellozship: the remembrance wherof hath induced me to record some things touching some such persons as haue possessed that dignitie.

The names and times of certeine chancellors of Scotland, gathered out of the histories of that nation.

William Wood, bishop of Dunblaine was chancelloz to William king of Scots, which began his reigne in the yeare of Christ 1185, as some haue (but Lesleus, lib. 6. hath 1160, whose account herein is false) and continued in that office at the time of the death of the said William, which fell in the yeare of Christ 1214. After whose death he was by Alexander the second confirmed in the same place of chancelloz.

John Lion chancelloz of Scotland (in the time of Robert the second of that name, and the first of the house of the Stewards which bore the crowne) was chancelloz of Scotland, who being in great fauour with the said Robert the second, married the ladie Elizabeth daughter vnto the said king, with whom he had in franke marriage diuerse possessions called Clames, wherby he was called lord of Clames; of which Lion is that surname descended, who in memorie of that marriage beare in their armes the lions and lillies, with the tressie in such forme as the king of Scotland beareth the same, except that their lions be placed in a blacke field, as Holinshed hath noted. Which Lion being chancelloz was slain in the yeare of our Lord 1380, being about the tenth yeare of the same Robert the second, who after banished the earle of Crawford.

Gilbert Grenlatz bishop of Aberdeen, being chancelloz about the yeare of Christ 1411, in the vacancie of the kingdom, vnder duke Moribacke, bestrawne the death of Robert the second (which fell in the yeare of Christ 1406, and the beginning of the reigne of James the first, in the yeare of our Lord 1426) was sent ambassadoz into France with other noble men of Scotland. After which ambassage in France this Gilbert liued not verie long: for Henrie Lichon, who came thoslie in his place of the bishopricke, was with other sent ambassadoz into England, to fetch home James the first, and to instruct him in the crowne of Scotland.

William Creighton knight, whom Lesleus termeth the wisest man that euer Scotland saw, being chancelloz to James the first, was (in the yeare 1433, about the ninth yeare of the same king James) with the earle of Angus, and Adam Hepburne of Hales, sent sent to the castle of Dunbar, with letters signed with the kings hand, directed to the keepers of the castle to deliver the same to the bringers thereof: which the keepers of that castle durst not disobey, but permitted them to enter accordingly. After this in the yeare of Christ one thousand four hundred thirtie five, & the eleventh of the same king, he was sent ambassador into Denmarke, where he concluded a sound peace betwene the nations of Denmarke and Scotland; which good service being well rewarded, he was after the death of James the first, and in the entrance of James the second into the government of Scotland, in the yeare of our Lord 1436, confirmed in his office of chancelorship, beside which he had the government of the kings person, and of the castle of Edinburgh committed to his charge. Then by reason of contention which fell betwene sir Alexander Levingston the governor of the realme and this chancelor, they fell to parts taking in the yeare of Christ one thousand four hundred thirtie and seven, whereby ensued much mischief and bloodshed in the realme (as alwaies by my obseruation I haue found to happen during the minoritye and the insufficiencye of kings) at that time the queene taking part with the governor against the chancelor, found means by subtiltie to get the king into hir possession out of the hands of the chancelor, after that she had handsomely trusted by the king in a tronke like a fardell full of apparell, whereupon the governor besieged the chancelor in the castell of Edinburgh, but in the end they agreed that Creichton should still keepe the castle of Edinburgh and his office of chancelor.

James the second.

That done, in the yeare one thousand four hundred thirtie and nine, and the third yeare of James the second, the chancelor obtained to haue the queen Dowager, and hir husband James Steward lord of Rothe released out of the prison of Sterling, whither they were committed by the governor. Which done, the chancelor keeping in mind the decree of the queene, in overreaching him by getting the king out of his possession, and seeing the governor to take the whole authoritie on him at his pleasure, did so worke, that he found means that he onely accompanied with foure & twentie persons, did againe get the king (as he was one morning hunting in Sterling parke) into his possession, whom he carried with him into the castle of Edinburgh, wherewith the governor was grievously displeased: but not able to remedie the same, there was an agreement made betwene the chancelor & him, that the king should remaine in the custodie of the chancelor, and the governor continue his office in administering the affaires of the realme. Whereupon in the yeare of Christ one thousand four hundred and fortie, and the fourth yeare of James the second, the governor and the chancelor assembled a councell of the nobilitie at Edinburgh. In the yeare of Christ one thousand four hundred fortie and foure, being the eight of the same James the second, both the governor and the chancelor (at the perswasion of William earle of Douglas) were removed from their offices by the king, who being now about foureteen yerres old, had taken the absolute government of the kingdome upon him: besides which they were also put from the councell, their friends were banished the court, and they were forbidden to appeare before the king, which they refused, not as guiltie in conscience, but as fearing the crueltie of their enemies, whereupon they were proclaimed rebels and put to the horne, which occasioned William Douglas the chancelor, by great entreatie to gather a power and spoile the lands of this William Creichton for requitall thereof, Creichton gathered a like power, entered the land of Douglas, and spoiled the same all that he could, which thing adding further heat to the Douglas, caused him to procure the king in the yeare of Christ one thousand four hundred fortie and five, being the ninth yeare of the kings reigne, to demand of Creichton the delivrie of the castles of Edinburgh and of Creichton, which he demeing to doe untill the king came to full age, had all his goods confiscat, having therein no intorie done unto him, so as saith Lesleus: Primus omnium sanciverat Creichtonus, ut qui regi castum aliquod postulanti restiterit, violata maiestatis arceatur, cuius ille legis poenam primus subiit, as he did which denised Malaxis bull. But after, when the king had besieged Edinburgh castle nine moneths, Creichton being therein, the same was delivered with condition, that Creichton should still remaine chancelor, which obtained, he neuer after delt in affairs of the common welth, whereby growing againe into the kings favour, he was with others in the yeare of Christ one thousand four hundred fortie & six, being the tenth of James the second, sent ambassador to the duke of Gelderland to obtaine Marie the dukes daughter to wife for the king, which he brought to passe. All which notwithstanding, in the yeare following he fell againe into the princes disgrace, and was by parlement holden in the yeare of Christ one thousand four hundred fortie and seven, so fasted, so that his servants would not deliver Creichtons house or castle to the king, as before you have heard. But after as it seemeth, such is the mutabilitie of fortune, he returned into the kings grace, for which in the yeare of Christ one thousand four hundred and fiftie, he was by the earle Douglas (supposing him to be the cause that the king disliked the earle) assaulted one morning as he was comming out of the castle of Edinburgh, from which although wounded, he escaped unto his castle of Creichton, where in short space after he assembled a power, recovered Edinburgh from the Douglas, and had destroyed the earle at that present, if he had not shifted awaie more speedily: who being thus dishonourably chased from Edinburgh, by the earle of Crawford and Ross to joine with him against Creichton, but he little esteeming thereof and requiting good for euill, did in the yeare of Christ one thousand four hundred fiftie and thre, or a thousand four hundred fiftie and foure as some haue, procure a pardon for the earle of Crawford, grievously fallen into the kings displeasure. In which yeare also the king calling a parlement at Edinburgh, the earldome of Marrie was given to sir James Creichton, or rather restored to him, from whence it had bene wrongfully taken by the unjust sentence of William earle of Douglas, who had procured it to be assigned to his brother Archibald Douglas, although the right remained in the same sir James Creichton. But yet when the same sir James could not keepe that earldome without the enuie of diuers persons, he surrendered the same into the kings hands. Beside all which at this parlement was George Creichton created earle of Cathness, which I thought good to note in this place, because it touched the name of Creichton, whereof I doe now treat by reason of this chancelor.

James the second.

Andrew Steward lord of Anandale was chancelor of Scotland in the yeare of Christ one thousand four hundred thre score and eight, being about the eight yeare of the reigne of king James the third, & was sent with others into Rome to conclude a marriage with the king of Denmarke, betwene his daughter Margaret & the king of Scots, which ladie he brought with him into Scotland in Julie, at that time they were married accordingly. Some yeares after which, that is about the yeare of Christ one thousand four hundred four score and two, and the two and twentieth of James the third, when Alexander Stewart Duke of Albanye with the duke of Gloucester were come unto Rastakrig, with the English power, this man amongst others, was sent to the English campe to treat with the two dukes, with whom in the end an agreement was made. By which the duke of Albanye, before fled out of Scotland, was restored home, and had both honors and offices bestowed on him; who with this chancellor & other noble men had the government of the kingdom for a certaine space: during which time, this duke the chancellor and others, going to visit the quene at Sterling, the duke by the quenes persuasion without knowledge of the other, went to Edinburgh, and by force restored the king to libertie, before taken and kept in hold by some of the nobilitie, which being knowne to the chancellor and the other lords at Sterling, they fled to their owne countries.

James Beton

James Beton archbishop of Glasco was chancellor in the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred & thirtie, being the first yeare of king James the first. This man being of great wisdom, was appointed amongst others to assist the quene in the government of the realme, whereunto he was for a time advanced: but the woman not induring to be directed by others, taking quarell against the bishop, did immediatlie after the marriage, performed the first of August, in the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred and foure score, betwene hir and Archibald Dornoglas earle of Angus (which this bishop incountried as much as he could) take the great seale from the said bishop of Glasco, at saint Johns towne, whereupon the bishop got him to Edinburgh, and assisted with manie lords, kept the quene and hir husband out of that towne, whereby great dissension and party taking was raised amongst the nobilitie of the realme. But as I gather, peace being made betwene them, he was againe made chancellor. After this, in the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred and thirtie, he continually with the earle of Arrarie, who submitted himselfe to the gouernor, shortly following, the gouernor gaue to this archbishop of Glasco the abbete of Arbroth, assigning to the earle of Arrarie a large pension out of the same, which bishop being thus in fauor with the gouernor, was in the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred and thirtie in estate, when the gouernor went into France appointed amongst others, to haue the rule of the realme until his returne. Two yeares after which, the nobilitie being disuised about the quarell of the earle of Angus & Arrarie, this bishop in the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred and thirtie, being then also chancellor, with other noble men of the realme, kept the towne of Glasco; but after that, this chancellor who would not come to Edinburgh, the king of England and of France their ambassadours came to Sterling, where a peace was proclaimed amongst the nobilitie.

But what can long continue in one state, or what peace will be long embraced amongst ambitious minds: for in the yeare following, being the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred and thirtie, the noble men fell againe to factions: for then diuelt of the parties were come to Edinburgh to also the earle of Angus against the earle of Arrarie (this chancellor remaining then in the towne) they put to the earle and chancellor so horlie, that they were both constrained to forsake the towne, and to flee through the north Loch, about the thirtieth date of April. But as the euents of quarels be doubtfull, now up now downe, so this archbishop not long after this disgrace, recordered breath; and in pouerment following, did accompanie the regent come out of France to Edinburgh, where was a parlement holden, to summon the earle of Angus to appeare; but he refusing, it was agreed that the earle should passe into England there to remaine.

The bishop thus hauing the better of his enemies, Andrew Forman bishop of S. Andrews died, in the yeare one thousand five hundred thirtie and two, being about the ninth yeare of James the first, by occasion whereof, this chancellor James Beton bishop of Glasco was advanced to that see, and further made abbat of Dumfermling. Upon which new honor, in the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred thirtie and foure, he was appointed one of the gouernors of the realme by parlement: but he not possessing this honor anie long time, the earle of Angus (who had gotten the king into his usurped government, and denied the deliuerie of the king, being sent for by this bishop and the other nobilitie) sent to the chancellor for the great seale, which was deliuered to the messengers: upon which, this bishop not forgetting the same, hastened the sentence of diuorce sued before him, betwene the quene and the earle of Angus. Whereof the earle, to reuenge the same, did with the king, in the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred thirtie and six, seke for the quene and the bishop of saint Andrews: but because they were kept secretlie in their friends houses (so that they could not be heard of) he spoiled the abbete of Dumfermling, and the castell of saint Andrews, taking awaie all that the archbishop had. Notwithstanding which, the archbishop keeping in fauor with the old quene and the young king, did in the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred thirtie and nine, and the sixteenth yeare of James the first, christen James the kings sonne borne at saint Andrews, and not long after, surrendered his soule to God in the said yeare one thousand five hundred thirtie and nine: of whome it shall not Greene me to set downe what Lesleus hath written, which though it be somewhat long, yet because it is necessarie, I had rather set downe the plaine words of the author, than by abridging of them into our our tongue; to deprive the author of his due by his owne stile: thus therefore he writeth.

Jacobus Betonius archiepiscopus Santandreapolitanus, qui maximis reipublice honoribus summaque gloria apud nos quam diutissime floruerat, etate iam grandior, natura concedebat; ac in æde sancti Andree tumulo honorifice tegebatur. Hic antistes quosdam, quos egregie charos habuit, viuis constituebat, ut in beneficia sibi mortuo sufficeretur. In episcopatum autem Santandreapolitanum, ac in abbatiam Arbrothensem, vir summa prudentia, & animi magnitudine præstans David Betonius eardnalis, eius ex fratre nepos, in abbatiam verò Dumfermlingenensem Georgius Dureus, in alia denique alij: quam illius voluntatem rex non impedivit; quo minus illi, quos archiepiscopus ante obitum constituerat, beneficijs libere fuissent: ne cuius viui mentem semper laudaret, eius mortui voluntatem malitiose videretur rescidisse. Hic archiepiscopus præcipuum illius collegij quod nouum Santandreapoli dicitur, partim suo sumptu excitauit, ac maximam pecunie vim qua reliqua pars indota perpoliretur, testato reliquit: verum pecunia illa in alios vsus postea traducta, collegij ius (ne quid acrius dicam) perierat. Thus much Lesle, and thus much I, touching this chancellor, spoken of also in my treatise of the archbishops of saint Andrews.

Gawen Dunbar archbishop of Glasco, and the kings scholemaster, was chancellor as appeareth by Lesleus lib. 9. pag. 399. who in in the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred thirtie and two, writeth: Non multo post Andreas Formannus episcopus

copus Santandropolitanus vitā cessit, huius quā primū honore ac titulo insigniebatur Iacobus Beton archiepiscopus Glasguensis, qui quidem archiepiscopus omniū summa voluntate cessit prætāfimo euidam viro Gawino Dunbarro; cui quod recōditā eruditionis, sinceræ vitæ consilijque grauiissimi laudibus prætiterit, regis tenella ætas moribus doctrinæque informanda credebatur, quem intimis sensibus ita dilexit rex, vt sui intimi concilij socium, regniq̃ cancellarium postea illum coaptauerat.

David Beton (the brothers sonne of James Beton deceased archbishop of saint Andrews) was chancelor of Scotland, who being abbat of Arbroth, was with others sent ambassadoz into France in the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred thirtie and four, being the one and twentieth yeare of the government of James the first, for to procure the earle of Maudslimes sister in marriage for the king; but the same toke not effect, because the king going in person into France liked hir not. About thre yeares after, which was in the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred thirtie and seven, and the four and twentieth yeare of James the first, this David was aduanced to the honor of a cardinal, of which title I do not at this time remember, that euier I haue read anie other to haue intioied but Walter Warblaw, of whome Onuphrius thus writeth: Walterus episcopus Glasguensis presbyter cardinalis creatus, anno Domini 1383, 10 kalend. Ianua. 6 pontificatus Clemētis 7, obiit inter annum 1400, & 1409, whome the Scottish histories make cardinal somewhat before in the yeare one thousand thre hundred fourscore and two, about the eleuenth yeare of Robert the second (at what time with others he was sent to Charles king of France as ambassadoz to renew the league betwene France & Scotland) by Paul the third, then pope of Rome, to whom also the king of France gaue in commendam the bishopricke of Miropen: of the making of which Beton cardinal, thus the same Onuphrius writeth: David de sancto Andrea Scotus episcopus Miropiensis presbyter cardinalis tituli sancti Stephani in Calio monte creatus, anno Domini, 1388, 13 kalend. Ianuar. per Paulum tertiu, anno pontificatus 13. In which words Onuphrius, and Lesleus following him, refer the creation of this cardinal vnto the yeare one thousand five hundred thirtie and eight, though others attribute it to the yeare one thousand five hundred thirtie and seven. In which yeare one thousand five hundred thirtie and eight, he was with others sent ambassadoz into France after the death of the queene, to procure Marie of Lorraine widow duchesse of Longuille, and daughter to the duke of Guise, to be giuen to king James in marriage; which matter he brought to his desired effect.

The next yeare after, being the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred thirtie and nine, as you haue heard before, he was by his vnckle James Beton archbishop of saint Andrews, & abbat of Arbroth, appointed to succede in the same bishops see and abbacie, which he intioied accordinglie: who aduanced with these dignities, did after the death of James the first, falling in the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred fortie and two, labor by policies and other extraordinarie deuises to be gouernor of the realme, during the minority of the young queene; but he was disappointed thereof by the nobilitie, who chose the earle of Arrane to that function; by meanes whercof, there fell continuall dissensions betwene the nobilitie, which ended not untill this cardinal was slaine as after it shall appeare. For thortie after in the said yeare one thousand five hundred fortie and two, being committed to ward (in the castle of Dalkeith vnder the custodie of the lord Beton, smallie favoring the French faction) because he would haue perswaded the nobilitie to forsake the motion of the R. of England, determining to marie his son prince Edward to the young queene of Scots. But the cardinal did not long remaine there; for by the gouernors appointment he was removed to his owne castell of S. Andrews, hauing watch and ward about him, to see him safelie kept, in which place also he did not long continue: for corrupting his keepers he found meanes to escape; which done, in the yeare one thousand five hundred fortie and thre, he came to the coronation of the young queene, and thortie after perswaded the earle of Arrane the gouernor to leaue the part of the king of England, and wholie to become French.

Now at the coronation, the cardinal ordered all things, appointing euerie officer, and growing into great credit, did in like sort at other times dispose of the common-wealth as seemed best liking vnto him. Whereupon, the earle of Lenear taking part with the English, opposed himselfe against the gouernor and the cardinal, whereby followed sharpe warres, the cardinal still supporting and counselling the gouernor: which troubles being somewhat abated, by reason the earle of Lenear was gone into England, the cardinal in the yeare of Christ one thousand four hundred fortie and four, receiued the patriarch of Jerusalem arrived in Scotland. In which meane time, there was great contention betwene the cardinal and the archbishop of Glasgow, for bearing their crosses in the others iurisdiction: whereupon they fell from words to swords, which the gouernor appeased: that done, the patriarch the popes legat comming to Rome, procured the legantine power to be granted to this cardinal, which he long intioied not. For being greaillie enuied by reason of these honors & some greuous facts, certeine persons in the yeare one thousand five hundred fortie and six (after that he had burned George Wilschart a learned man, condemned at saint Andrews by an assemblie of bishops) did the thirtenth date of Aprill (when they had secretlie in the morning entered the castell of saint Andrews where the cardinal was) repell the porters of the foresaid castell, the cardinals seruants, and slue the cardinal, naked as he came to meete them, whose death sir James Hatermount prouost of saint Andrews thought to haue staied by assembling a power therefore: but after that he saw the cardinals dead bodie hanged out ouer the wals, he made no further attempt. The death of which cardinal comming to the gouernors eares, he banished the author thereof, as writeth Lesleus in these words: Gubernator, quod nec cognato suo, sanguinis coniunctio, nec cardinalis dignitas, nec cancellarius maiestas ac domus propria, ad impiorum insidias effugas quicquam profuerit, ageriem ferre. Consilio itaque Huntlei ac Argadij iussu indicto, in cardis auctores capitis proserptionisque sententia data est.

George Gordon earle of Huntlei sonne of John Gordon, being chancelor of Scotland, in the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred fortie and seven, falling about the first yeare of the reigne of Marie queen of Scots, was taken prisoner by the English at Dunkelborow field, who pitting the miserie of diuerse of his countrymen, wounded and taken at the same battell, did vnder take for their ransom; whereupon they were permitted to depart, and left to shift for themselves as well as they might. In the next yeare, which was the yeare of Christ (as hath Lesleus one thousand five hundred fortie and eight) the protector of Scotland sent Carnegie knight and senator to the protector of England, to requeste Huntlei, or at the least to obtaine that his wife might toke might come unto him. Whereupon the earle was with his keepers permitted to come to Sporth, where expecting his wife, he thought upon his escape, and from thence after supper, deceiving his warders, he fled by night into Scotland; through the aid of one George Carre his deere friend, who provided him speedie horses therefore. The earle being thus come into Scotland, was instantly intertained of the quene, the gouernor, and the other nobilitie; but chiefelie of his wife, whose earnest desire to see him was the occasion of his escape. But as all soe hath some hard hap for the most part attending upon the same; so this earle did after feele the force of like misfortune. For about seven yeares after, in the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred fiftie and foure, he was againe committed to prison as after shall appeare. Before which, in the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred and fiftie, he with other noble men goeth into France with the quene mother of Scotland; but before that iournee, whilst he was preparing for the same, he commanded William Shackintoch chiefe of the Glenbatkins to be executed at Stratbolgie, for a priue conspiracy made against him, being the kings lieutenant in the north parts. Which thing raised a great commotion like to haue succeeded to great slaughters (in that the earle of Cassels and manie others fauored Shackintoch) if the wisdom of the quene mother had not appeased the same.

After that the quene mother had bin in France, she in the same yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred and fiftie, returned into Scotland through England: but the earle Huntley warlike fearing to fall into the dangers of the English (whome he thought would not forget his escape from them, returned by sea into his owne countrie: after which, when he had bene about foure yeares in Scotland, the quene mother regent in the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred fiftie and foure, sent this earle Huntley into Heiland to take John Muziad: but returning without him, he was committed to prison in Edinburgh the eleventh of October: at what time the regent changed all the officers, toke away the great seale from this earle Huntley the chancelloz, and gaue it to monsieur Robie a French man, which monsieur Robie thus made keeper of the great seale in the said yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred fiftie and foure, and the twelfth yeare of Marie quene of Scots, had the vse of the same seale in the place of the earle Huntley then chancelloz in ward. But the earle of Huntley after being set at libertie, it seemeth that he was still chancelloz. For besides that Lesleus saith that he was restored to all his dignities (except the earldome of Murreie, whereof he had a gift of inheritance, the earldome of Marre, the farmes of Mhenete & Heiland, and the quenes land at Straitsdie, all which he gaue for his libertie) he is also by the Scottish histories named still chancelloz, in the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred threescore and one, and the nineteenth yeare of quene Marie, being then by the nobilitie amongst other, chosen to be of the priue council. Of whome before this also Lesleus writeth, that in the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred fiftie and nine, the quene hauing receiued a bill of supplication from the protestants: Illa hunc protinus libellum supplicem per Huntleum regni cancellarium synodo exhibendum, vt de illis desiniret, reddidit.

After this, in the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred thre score and two, in October being the twentieth yeare of the same quene, he was in the faction betwene him and others (for diuerse misdemeanors also, upon his coming with an armie to Cornethie in Mar)aine, and John Gordon his sonnetaken prisoner, thought to Aberdine the nine and twentieth of October, and there beheaded. Now for the other chancellors which followed in succession of time, because they fall yet fresh in memorie, and some mention is made of them in this my continuation of these annals; I do not intend to make any double recital of them in that place, being a thing superfluous so to do; & therefore, & because Omne nimium ueretur in uitium (whereto the lawiers agree saing; that Frustra fit per plura quod fieri potest per pauciora) I will referre the for the supplement of this title of the chancellors, to the same continuation of my annals, there at thy pleasure to collect and dispose them, as best shall serue thine owne memorie or knowledge.

Wherefore leauing them, and returning to the consideration of other things, which following time hath begotten and brought forth in Scotland: we saie, that as the quene of England had before time, after the taking of Sterling, sent maister Knolles into Scotland to vnderstand the estate of these times: so in like sort the Scots with like congratulation, dispatched a messenger vnto the quene of England, by whome the might haue knowledge of such things as were after done. For maister William Keith one of the chamber to the king, was sent from the king of Scots to the quene of England in the same moneth of December, a little before Christmas with letters, who coming to the court then remaining at Greenwich, did there make deliuerie of the same letters. During whose abode here in England, some of those which had before assisted the earles of Angus and Marre, against such as seemed to nourish the king in the Romane religion, fell from their former opinion, & either for loue to the same Romane religion, or for malice to other of the nobilitie, or for a desire to be singular to themselves, embraced the abolished doctrine of the pope, & set by the ceremonie of Italie. Amongst whom, one, not of the meaneest, the lord Marwell, who had married the earle of Angus his sister, did in Januarie aduance the same, and heard masse at Lincluden a mile from Dumfries, contrarie to the publike lawes appointed in Scotland. Wherof intelligence being brought vnto the king, he forthwith dispatched a messenger vnto him, commanding him to surcease the same. But the lord Marwell persisting in that his former action, was (in the end apprehended, and upon the refusal of an oth touching the same, according to the lawes of Scotland) committed to prison in Edinburgh, where he long remained.

These things thus done in Scotland, the aforesaid maister Keith departed from London towards that countrie, about the foure and twentieth of Januarie, with answer that his maiestie of England would shortly send an ambassadoz into Scotland, who should fullie satisfie the king in all things, and further deliuer vnto him the fall of his maiesties determination. Whereupon Thomas Randolph esquier, a person who had manie times before executed that function in those countries, and was well acquainted both with the state & manners of the people, was by the quene of England dispatched into those parts; who being so authorized, toke his iournee from London towards Scotland on the eight date of Februarie. After which, in Aprill following, maister Archibald Dowglass (one that had bene sometime of the session or parliament of Edinburgh) hauing remained some yeares here in England, upon displeasures which the king of Scots conceived against him, did make his returne into his owne countrie, where he behaued himselfe so wiselie, that he obtained great fauor after his returne home. In this yeare, the presbyterie (as they had manie times done before, but especiallie in the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred fourescore and thre, which I thought to note in this place, because I would not often vse repetition of one thing done at seuerall times in so manie places) did excommunicat their metropolitan the archbishop of S.

Andrews, and the rest of the bishops also, because they would not in all their actions, support and con-firme the doctrine which the presbyterie had established. Which excommunication the presbyterie did the more boldlie, because they were supported by the assistance of the maister of Lindseie, a great enimie to this Patrike Adamson bishop of saint Andrews.

But the king in the beginning did assist him against them, and the archbishop did in like sort thunder an excommunication against them. Which diuision not being meete to be in the cleargie, who ought to be (as the apostles were) of one hart, and of one mind, will in the end as Christ saith, bring the same realme to confusion: for Omne regnum in se diuifum desolabitur: which must needs be, where euerie man will be a lord, & that the inferior of the clergie will neither acknowledge nor obeie antie superiours. In which place, sith I haue mentioned Patrike Adamson the archbishop of saint Andrews, because I shall not haue occasion to speake antie more of him, I will here set downe a collection of all the archbishops of that see.

A Cathalog of the archbishops of saint Andrews, collected out of the histories of Scotland.

The Scots seeking meanes to rid themselues from subiection of the bishop of Rome, who was the metropolitan of Scotland, did in the yeare of Christ one thousand foure hundred threescore and fouretene obtaine of the pope that they might haue a metropo-litane see within themselves, by reason of the continual wars which was betwene the two nations; during which they could neither vse appellations to their metropolitan, nor haue other bishops consecrated. Whereupon the pope erected the church of S.
Andrews into an archbishopricke in the time of king James the third, touching which, thus writeth Lesleus, lib. 8. pag. 317. Hoc anno (which was the yeare of Christ one thousand foure hundred threescore and fouretene) Patricius Grahamus sedis Andreapolita-næ ecclesiæ episcopus, crebris litteris ac nuntijs a papa efflagitauit, vt metropolitana potestas in diui Andree ciuitate fingeretur: iniquum esse enim contendit, vt Scoti ab Eboracensi episcopo, tanquam primate pēderent, cum propter crebra bella (quibus se Scoti & Angli mutuo laceffunt) Scotis ad illum non pateretur tutus accessus, nec liberum ius, præsertim in appellationibus. Annuit summus pontifex, vt Andrea-politano deinceps episcopo potestas metropolitana incumbat. Dies indulto pontifici promulgandi mense Septembri dicta est, atque maxima populi nobilitumque laetitia celebrata. Episcopi reliqui Grahami odio flagrantibus, illius auctoritatem repudiant, regisque animum ingenti pecunia (which was as other authorz saie, eleuen thousand marks) occupant, ne Grahami partibus studeret. Interea præfules Romæ mittunt qui sui defensionem contra Grahamum suscipiunt. But in the end they did not preuaile. Graham was made archbishop.

Patrike Graham being bishop of saint Andrews and the first archbishop of that see, was after his ad-uancement to that title deppined in this sort. In the yeare of Christ one thousand foure hundred threscore and seuentene, pope Nissus the fourth of that name sent a legat called Husman into Scotland, which should displace this Patrike the archbishop of saint Andrews, condemned by the sentence of the pope and the cardinals for an heretike, schismaticke, simoniacke, whereupon he was deppined of all ecclesiasticall dignitie, and conimanded to perpetuall prison; in whose place was William Schewes chosen, to whose custodie and disposition this Patrike was committed, after which Graham being remoued for his safe imprisonment first to saint Colms Ile, then to Dumfermeling, and lastlie to Locheleune, there in the end he died, and was buried in saint Sharmis or Seruianus Ile in Locheleune after that he had bene thre yeares archbishop.

William Schewes being created archbishop of saint Andrews in the yeare of Christ one thousand foure hundred threescore and eightene as some haue, or one thousand foure hundred threescore and ninetene as others haue, in the Holie rood house in Co-denburgh, in the presence of king James and manie of the nobilitie receiued the pall, as the ensigne of his metropolitan power, being declared legat and primat of Scotland, at that time he was not withstood by anie of the other bishops, who being estranged from thewing anie fauor to Graham, did often infringe his authoritie, and in the end expelled the same Graham from his archiepiscopeall see. After which in the yeare of Christ one thousand foure hundred fourescore & two, this archbishop Schewes fled into his owne countrie, and after at the request of the king resigned his archbishopricke, contenting himselfe with the bishopricke of Purrie.

Andrew Steward vncle to king James the third was vpon the resignation of William Schewes made archbishop of saint Andrews, after which in the yeare of Christ one thousand foure hundred foure score and foure the king sent this archbishop ambassador to Rome for the obtaining of certeine priuileges, which he brought to effect. In the yeare of Christ one thousand foure hundred fourescore and eleuen, in the time of king James the fourth, about the third yeare of his reigne was great contention betwene the archbishops of saint Andrews and Glascow, touching both their authoritties: which when it had drawen manie of the nobilitie into diuers factions, it was ceased by the king for a certeine time, untill all doubt thereof might be taken auaile, by deciding the same by the canon law before ecclesiasticall iudges. When in the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred and seuen, being about the nineteenth yeare of James the fourth, the bishop of saint Andrews with the earle of Arrane were sent ambassadors into France.

Alexander Steward bassard sonne to king James the fourth, was made archbishop of saint Andrews in the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred and ten, about the two and twentieth of the reigne of the same James the fourth: this man hauing long sta-died with Erasmus in Germanie, and in the low countrie was aduanced to this see of the archbi-shopricke when he was yet in flanders; who hauing intelligence thereof by his frends, came forthwith into Scotland, where he was sofullie receiued by the king, the nobilitie, & his kindred. He was slaine togither with his father king James the fourth at Floden field, in the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred and thirtene. After which, John Hepburne prior of saint Andrews strongly besieging the castle of saint Andrews, forced the same to be yielded vnto him. The cause of which bessege grew, that Hepburne being chosen bishop of saint Andrews by his canons of that church (wherevnto the whole nobilitie were helpers) was hindered to possesse that archbishopske, by such stipendarie people of Gawine Doolglaſſe as kept the castle; whereupon the queene and the earle of Angus, after that they understood how the castle was by force come into the hands of Hepburne, did take in euill part that he who was so troublesome vnto them, should ascend to so high a dignitie, and that Gawine Doolglaſſe so deere to them beloued, and to whom they had giuen that bishopske should be helpelesse of the recouerie therof. Whereupon the queene and the duke of Albanie diligentlie labored by ambassadores sent to Rome, that a third person (such Gawine Doolglaſſe could not obtaine it) might be advanced therevnto, which third man was Andzew Forzman bishop of Purrie: further requiring therewithall that he might be abbat of Dumfermling, & Aberbroth, which in the end with much intreatie they obtained of the pope.

Andzew Forzman.

Andzew Forzman bishop of Purrie was at Edinburgh by the popes bulls on the eighth kalends of Januarie in the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred and sixtene (being about the second yeare of the reigne of James the first) declared archbishop of S. Andzeus, and abbat of Dumfermling and Aberbroth. Whereupon the prior of saint Andzeus before named, still contending that he was archbishop, both in respect of the election of the couent, and the consent of the nobilitie, did labor all he could against Forzman, appealing him to Rome, for which cause he with the lord Hales and other his friends came to Edinburgh to defend the matter, at what time the lord Hume chamberlaine of Scotland and such others as openly assisted Forzman, did oppose themselves against the prior, which nobilitie (because they were great in the court) did the more molest and hinder Hepburne, shortly after by publike edict (and proclamation of the king) banishing the prior & his followers. Hepburne being stricken with the sharpnes of that precept, did pryncially depart the towne, and the prior went to Rome, hoping by the popes authoritie to wrest from Forzman the archbishopske, which he could not obtaine by violence. But how he sped at Rome I do not know, for I onelie find this, that in the yeare following, being the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred and sixtene, about the third yeare of the same James the first, that the gouernour perceiving that all these contentions, hatreds, and diuisions of the nobilitie did arise by these bzailes, which were betwene Forzman and Hepburne for the see of saint Andzeus, desired to cure this greivous wound made in the commonwealth. Wherefore he perswaded Andzew Forzman that he should resigne all his ecclesiasticall benefices into his hands in an open assemblee at Edinburgh, for by that meanes the gouernour thought that he might pacifie the minds of the nobilitie, and utterlie root out those breaches of dissention. Whereupon there was a daie appointed to the nobilitie to assemble: at what time Andzew Forzman frelie resigned to the gouernour the duke of Albanie all his ecclesiasticall promotion, to be disposed at the dukes pleasure. In consideration thereof, the duke bestowed the archbishopske of saint Andzeus and the abbete of Dumfermling vpon the same Andzew Forzman, and gaue the bishopske of Purrie to James Hepburne (greatlie fauored of the earle Bothwell and the competitor of Forzman) being therevnto substitute by John Hepburne prior of saint Andzeus in place of the said John, to whom moreover the duke appointed a perelie pension of a thousand marks, to be paid by the same Forzman out of the abbete of Dumfermling. After which, about six yeares or somewhat lesse, this Forzman departed his life, being in the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred twentie and two, and the ninth yeare of king James the first, to whom succeeded James Beton.

James Beton archbishop of Glasco and chan- James cello of Scotland, was made archbishop of saint Beton, Andzeus (as is before touched) after the death of Andzew Forzman, hauing therewith the abbete of Dumfermling, as his predecessor before had possessed it, of whom see more in my discourse of the chancellors of Scotland.

David Beton brother to the same James Beton David was after the death of the last archbishop of saint Beton, Andzeus named to that see by his brother before his death, which place he possessed accordingly, after the death of the same James Beton. Of this man being a cardinall I haue spoken more liberally in my discourse of the chancellors of Scotland.

John Hamilton (brother to the gouernour) being John Hamilton, abbat of Passaic, was by the same gouernour in the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred forty and six, being about the fourth yeare of Marie quene of Scots made archbishop of S. Andzeus, after that he had returned out of France (where he applied his studie) in the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred forty & three, being the first or second of quene Marie of Scotland. This man comming out of France, passed through England, and hauing other learned men in his companie, did visit the king of England, of whom he was most honourable and courteously receiued. From thence going into Scotland he was made treasurer, which office he kept as long as his brother was gouernour, whom he did further in all good counsels at home, and saue & defend in the wars abroad. Then in the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred fiftie and nine, being the seauententh of quene Marie, he was with the quene besieged in Leith. After still following the quenes part, he with others metely hir in the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred fiftie and six, at Puskelborow, and so attendeth on hir, who not long after in the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred seuentie & one, being about the fourth yeare of James the first, was taken in the castell of Dunbratane, and sent prisoner into Sterling, where being examined by the regent Mattheu earle of Lennox, about the murder of Henrie king of Scots, sonne to the said Mattheu, he was there drawne, hanged, and quartered, being the first archbishop that I haue yet heard of that suffered so ignominious a death.

Patrike Adamson alias Constance succeeded Patrike Adamson, John Hamilton in the archbishopske of saint Andzeus, who possessing this place at this daie, and hauing occasioned me to speake of him in severall places in this my continuance of the annales of Scotland, is here to be overpassed, and therefore I referre thee to the same annales, if thou desire to know what I haue said of him. Thus knitting vp the catalog of the archbishops of S. Andzeus, we saie that as you haue heard before, that in Februarie last Thomas Randolph esquier was sent ambassador from the quene of England into Scotland, so he still remaining there a long time in that countrie dispatched his ambassage to good effect. During whose abode there, there was an assemblee holden at Edinburgh in Maie, wherein these things which follow were concluded vpon for the establishing and order of the same commonwealth.

The articles concluded in the assemblee holden at Edinburgh in Maie.

First, the whole realme was diuided into 52 presbyteries, & the number of ministers and churches appointed to euery presbyterie.

A t. y.

2 That

2 That there shall be two prouinciall assemblies in the yeare in euerie prouince, the first tuesday of October and Aprill.

3 There shall be one generall assemblee in the yeare, the first of October next ensuing.

4 All assemblies doe consist of these persons, the pastoz, docto, and elders, & all the thre to haue votes, as well in the presbyteries prouinciall as generall assemblies: and that all such as haue ante lutes in the assemblies may see and here, but giue no vote except they be of the number of the thre afore specified.

5 That there was onelie foure offices in the church, the pastoz, docto, elder and deacon, and that the name of bishop was onlie proper to the pastoz or minister, and that he had especiall charge and function in the church, but no greater than a common pastoz.

6 Item, that visitation in the church was lawfull, and at this time necessarie, in respect of the eldship as yet is not lawfullie planted, and that this visitation did appertene onelie to a pastoz or pastozs sent from the assemblee, and not else.

7 That when euer the assemblee maketh mention of a bishop, they meane onelie S. Paules bishop and none other.

8 That the receiuing of presentations, giuing of collations, trial of ministers, deposing them for iust causes, shall be in the power of the most learned and soundest iudgement of two presbyteries, and this to stand untill the presbyteries be better erected.

9 That a commissioner appointed by the generall assemblee, being a pastoz, as pastoz shall be tried and censured in life and doctrine by the presbyterie, or prouinciall assemblee, but in respect of his commission, he shall be tried by the generall assemblee, of whome he receiued the same.

10 If he admit or do any thing without consent of his assemblee, it shall be of no effect, and a iust cause of his deposition.

11 The power which he shall receiue shall be Ordinis causa non iurisdictionis.

12 Commission appointed by the prouinciall or generall assemblies to visit, shall visit presbyteries or particular churches, alwaies not presudging the power of the presbyterie within the bounds of their visitation.

13 The visitors appointed by the generall assemblee for this present to stand for one yeare, and thereafter as the assemblee shall appoint.

14 That no commission giuen by ante in times past before the date of this assemblee shall be vailleable, but such onlie as the said assemblee shall appoint. In which assemblee also it seemeth that the kings maiestie made certaine requests, to haue somewhat established concerning the bishop of saint Andrews, whereupon these things were concluded against him, and he brought to subscribe the same, to the presence of his metropolitane iurisdiction ouer the rest of the clergie of his crowne.

The meanes taken in this generall assemblee, touching the bishop of S. Andrews, at the desire of the kings maiestie.

If the bishop by his owne handwritting or personall appearance in the assemblee, will in Gods presence denie, that euer he publickly professed or meant in ante to claime a supremacie, or to be iudge ouer other persons and ministers, or euer auowed the same to haue a ground in Gods word: and that if he had so done, it had bene great error and against his conscience and knowledge.

2 If he will denie, that in the last synodall assemblee he claimed to be iudge thereunto, and that if he had done it, that he erred in it, and in his impious behauiour or contempt of the said synod and his brethren, in that he will remit him to the brethren present, and craue pardon for the oversight thereof, and promise god behauiour in the time to come.

3 If he will promise to claime no further than he iustlie may by God his word, and according to the last conference, and endeavour himselfe in all behauiour to shew himselfe in all time to come a moderate person, and so serue, as that he may proue agreeable for a bishop prescribed by S. Paule, and so submit his life and doctrine to the iudgement and censure of the generall assemblee without any reclamation, prouocation, or appellation from the same in any time to insue.

These things being demanded at the archbishops hands, he was contented to yield to them by subscribing his name with his owne hand thereunto, which done, the said assemblee at Edinburgh did for their part in like sort publish their dutifull mind and obedience to his maiestie, in aduulling the processe of excommunication against the said bishop of saint Andrews, and to continue him in his former estate, as followeth.

OF his maiesties satisfaction, and to giue testimonie with what god will we would obete his helres so farre as we ought, or in conscience we may, and for god hope we haue in his maiesties fauourable concurrence in building up of the house of God within this realme, and because the processe of excommunication was laid, and the sentence pronounced during the time of the conference, whereupon his maiestie hath taken occasion of offense, which for manie god causes were conuenient to be remoued, we will so beare to examine the said processe, or decide it, whatsoeuer prouocation or appellation, or to call in doubt the legalitie or forme of the said processe, or to condemne the said synod. Yet for the respects afore said, and vpon god and weightie considerations, we hold the said processe and sentence as vnlaid, vnderduted or pronounced, and restore the said bishops in all respects so farre as may concerne the said processe and sentence of excommunication in the former estate he was immediatly before the same, like as no processe nor sentence had ben laid and deducted against him. Providing alwaies he obserue what hath bene promised by him in the premises, & behaue himselfe dutifullie in his vocation in all times comming.

This done the earle of Rutland (having a commission directed to him, to William lord Cuers, and to the same Thomas Randolph) went to Berwikke as his maiesties ambassadours, to confirme that league betwene the two nations of England and Scotland, which the said Randolph had before concluded. Whereupon the commissioners of England, the earle of Rutland, and the lord Cuers, from out of England, and Thomas Randolph from out of Scotland, came to Berwikke the place appointed where this league should be fullie established. For the meeting of whome at the same place, were commissioners of like number, and equall honor and authority, appointed to come to Berwikke for Scotland. But some delate being made of their appearance, and manie excuses therewith to intertaine time by messengers bled, at the length commeth to Berwikke Francis earle Bothwell, Robert lord Woid, and and sir James Hume of Colden Knowles knight and baron, commissioners for the king of Scots, who there meeting with the foresaid commissioners of England, did conclude a league defensive and offensive betwene these two nations; which done, the earle of Rutland returned home, and maister Randolph departed againe into Scotland to take his leaue of the king, whome when he had saluted he left, and returning into England came to London about the fiftenth of August, where I will now leaue him. ¹⁰ But before I turne my pen to any of the persons of Scotland, I determine to set downe certeine verses which Buchanan dedicated vnto him. For although they be matter impertinent to this historie of Scotland, yet because they were written to him (here mentioned) by a Scot, and are meet for the instructions of the young Scottish king, I will not refuse to set them downe in this sort as followeth:

*Sape tibi Randolphe iubet me pingere regem, Qualem optem, tribuat sic mihi vota Deus.
Accipe: sit primum vera pietatis amator, Effigiem summi se putet esse Dei, Pacem amet: et si res poscat, sit ad arma paratus, Exuat in victos arma, odiūque simul, Nolo nimis parcus, nimium sit nolo benignus, Vt rāque regno aqua est exitiosa lues, Non sibi sed populo sese putet esse creatum, Et se communem diuibus esse patrem: Puniat iniustus, cum res iubet esse seuerum, Publica cum poscent commoda lenis erit.
Viuat, vt exemplar populo sit recta sequendi, Sit vultus prauis terror, amorque bonus, Excolat impense ingenium, corpusque modestē, Luxuriam frangat cum ratione pudor:
Iam tacitus tecum, sentas me sūllere, tanquam In tabula nostram, qui mihi pingit heram.*

During the time of the abode of this Randolph in Scotland, there was an ambassadoe sent from the king of France to the king of Scots, which ambassadoe being called monsieur D'annauall ⁴⁰ had at this time small intertainment in Scotland; where not staid long after that Randolph was come into England, he also came hither out of Scotland, to the end to passe through this countrie into France. This summer Montgomerie erle of Eglinton, whose father died not manie yeares before, hauing married the daughter of the lord Boyd was slaine in this sort. The earle being a goodlie young gentleman, and like to proue a good member of his countrie, as manie of his ancestors had done before, did for his delight ride forth on hunting (a warlike exercise, & much vsed by the Scots) about five or six miles fro his owne castell, where hauing satisfied his pleasure, he returned home. But hauing wait laid for him by an ambush of his enemies, he was in his forne towards his castell intercepted by the lord of Glencarns brother, with the lards of Hacket and Robertlands, and some of the surnames of the Wals; at what time he was most miserablie slaine by them to their great dishonour, and his countries discommoditie. After which, in September Archibald Dowglaste (who as you heard before departing this realme in Aprill last, was admitted to come into his owne countrie) was sent ambassadoe from the king of Scots to the quene of England; in whose companie were attendant on him William Purro one of the kings chamber, and Richard Dowglaste nephew vnto the same Archibald. Which ambassadoe after his comming into England, had full audience at the court then remaining at Windsor, on the first of the same moneth of September, with whom remaining still here in England, at the writing hereof, expecting the end of his ambassage; I will set end to this slender discourse. Thus hauing patched vp a Rapshode of some few things done in Scotland since the yeare of our Lord one thousand five hundred seuentie and one, in which I began my annals of that countrie so needlie deliuered by me, I determine to knitt vp all that soeuer is set downe before, with a catalog of such writers of Scotland, as either by mine owne search in histories, or by others intelligence by conference haue come vnto my hand. The which I haue bene the willinger to do, because I would obserue that course in Scotland which I haue done in my additions to the historie of England, first written by Raphael Holinshed. For hauing there closed vp that historie with a generall catalog of all such as haue written anie thing concerning England, so will I close vp these annals of Scotland, much after that manner, with a generall discourse of the writers of that countrie. In doing whereof I haue not refused to follow the order of Lesleus and other historiographers of Scotland; obseruing the like course in the repetition of the names of a few persons at the end of most of their kings.

A generall catalog of the writers of Scotland, with the times in which they liued, as well of the yeare of Christ, as of the reigne of Scottish kings.

³⁰ BEfore I enter into the discourse thereof (which I speake not by waie of impeaching anie glorie of the Scottish nation) I must deliuer the opinion which I conceiue of some of the Scottish writers, set downe by manie of their historiographers, who (sauiug exception) finding manie learned writers to be termed Scots, do transerre them to all their owne countrie of Scotland. But in that they saue vnto me (holding the same for this present untill I may see good authoritie to disproue it) to be ouer conetous in taking from other that which is their due. For I do verelie suppose, that manie of those men so termed Scots were Irishmen borne. For untill late yeeres a little before the conquest (if my memorie faile me not) the Irishmen were called Scotti; Scots; wherevpon it is, that the Scots and Irishmen at this daie now knowne by seuerall names, do challenge Duns, Columbanus, and others to be borne amongst them, some calling them Scots, and other naming them Irishmen, and rebuking the Scots for chalenging those men vnto them. For although the Scots came out of Ireland, and the Irish were called Scots, it is no reason to call a Scot borne in Ireland, by the name of a Scot borne in Scotland, as some writers do vnder the amphibologicall name of Scot. But I (whose determination is not to aduance the one, or derogat from the other) will onlie in this place set them downe as I find them, & shew the different opinions touching the same, first leaving it to the iudgement of others, to thinke thereof as they please; for I neither may nor will sit as Honorarius arbiter betwene those two nations. Wherefore thus I enter into the catalog of the writers of Scotland as followeth.

Fergusius the first of that name king of Scots, Fergusius who died, as hath Gesnerus out of Bale, in the yeere of the world three thousand six hundred seuentie and eight, and two hundred ninetie and two before the birth of our Lord Iesus Christ, but Lesleus saith three hundred and five before Christ, did write Leges politicas lib. 1. This man the Irish make to be there borne amongst them; for thus writeth Scanihurst in his writers of Ireland: Fergusius sonne to Feguarus king of Ireland, the first king of Scots, whome some affirme to be borne in Denmarke, the more part part suppose to haue bene an Irishman, was in the five and twentieth yeare of his reigne by misfortune drowned nere a rocke in the north part of Ireland, that of him at this daie is called Caerfergus. Upon whose mishap these verses following were made:

Icarus Icaris vt nomina fecerat vndis, Fergusius petræ sic dedit apra suæ.

Joshua.

Joshua, the ninth king of Scots, after Fergusius the first, who flourished in the yeare of the world, as hath Gesnerus, three thousand eight hundred twentieth and six, before the birth of Christ one hundred thirtie and seven, as the same author saith, but one hundred three score and one as hath Lesseus lib. 2. pag. 89 did write De viribus herbarum lib. 1.

Ethodius.

Ethodius the first of that name king of Scots, who (delighting in musike) was in the yeare of Christ one hundred ninetie and foure, and the third yeare of his reigne, as hath Lesseus, but one hundred ninetie and six, as hath Gesnerus, slain by a musician of the Hebrewes, did write Ad Pictorum Celcius Sedulius.

Celcius Sedulius a Scot by birth, as hath Gesnerus, which flourished about the yeare of Grace foure hundred and thirtie, in the reigns of Fergusius the second, and Eugenius the second, kings of Scots, who being a companion to Hildebert a learned bishop of the Scots, did after the death of Hildebert for further learning trauell into Spaine, France, Italie, Greece, and Asia, as hath Lesseus lib. 4. pag. 134. Whome the pope Gelasius wondering at his vertue and writing was wont to call Venerabilem, or worthy reuerence, as our English Bede is accustomed to be termed. This Sedulius did write Carmen paschale lib. 4. which books are intitled Libri mirabilium diuinorum. Besides, he penned Annotationes in omnes Pauli epistolas, printed at Basil by Henrie Peter, Hymnum de seruatore. Ad Theodosium Cæsarem lib. 1. In ædificationem Donati lib. 1. In Prisciani volumen lib. 1. Exhortatorium ad fideles lib. 1. De Christo lib. 2. with diuerse other verses and epistles.

Merlinus Calidonus.

Merlinus Calidonus otherwise called Merlinus Syluestris, or Glandif (a different person from him which is called Merlinus Ambrosius Britannus) was borne in the borders of Scotland, and the scholer of the British prophet Telesinus. This Merline Calidon executed manie prodigies or strange things against the English Saxons, which man flourishing about the yeare of Christ five hundred and seuentie, did write De vaticinijs lib. 1. in which he intreated of matter belonging to historie.

Columbanus.

Columbanus, whome Gesnerus, Bede, and the Irish histories affirme to be an Irishman borne in Ulster, but Sixtus Senensis in his Bibliotheca sancta, Lesseus, & the Scottish & Englishmen name to be of other nations, as of Scotland and England, was a monke & father of manie monasteries, being Abbas Luxuriensis, as hath Gesnerus, Sixtus Senensis, and Lelle, being a place in Burgundie, which abbete he built (by the permission of Theodoricus the king) together with the abbete of Fount-nelle in France. This man at the first held the feast of Easter contrarie to the west church, but in the end was reduced thereto. He went into Almaine now Germanie, where he left saint Gall, and after passed into Italie, where he liued a most holie life in the monasterie of Bobiens, or (as hath Marianus) of Bontiens, which he built for a perpetuall monument of his liberalitie, and died in the same on the twentieth daie of November. He flourished in the time of Conballus king of Scots, about the yeare of our redemption five hundred ninetie and eight, and left these books to posteritie, Commentaria in totum psalterium lib. 1. Epistolarum lib. 1. Monasteriorum methodos lib. 1. Aduersus Theodoricum regem adulterum lib. 1. De moribus monachorum metricè lib. 1. Collationes ad monachos lib. 1.

Briget, a most holie woman, whome the Irish affirme to be borne in Limster, but Gesnerus and Lelle with the Scots do affirme hir to be borne a Scot, being by Gesner called Brigida Lagenensis, she became religious, and was veiled by the bishop of Mann, as hath Lesseus lib. 4. pag. 149. she flourished about the yeare of our Lord five hundred three score and eight, as hath Lesseus, in the reigne of Conballus king of Scots; some other saie she flourished in the yeare five hundred and ten, Gesnerus in the yeare of Christ five hundred and eightene, and wrote twelue books of reuelations verie darke and full of mysteries, which books Lesseus will not haue to be written by this Brigida Scottish woman, but by Briget called Brigida Suetica that flourished manie yeres after this Scottish Briget, writing thus: Imperitè tamen hanc nostram cum Brigita Suetica, cuius nomine reuelationes multæ inscribuntur, quidam cõfundit: siquidẽ multis sæculis hanc Brigita nostra fuisse posteriorem satis constat. Tanta veneratione Scoti, Picti, Britanni, Angli & Hibernenses diuam Brigitam sunt vbique prosecuti, vt plura templa Deo in illius memoriam apud illos omnes erecta videas, quàm in vllius ceterorum diuorum omnium. Illius sanctum corpus Hibernici, Duni, quo loco sancti Patricij illorum apostoli corpus seruatur se habere contendunt. Nostri eandem gloriam sibi vendicant, qui id ipsum in canonicorum collegio Abrenethi rectè se colere hætenus putantur, &c. Touching which I haue read these old verses, by which the Irishmen challenge hir with Columbanus and Patricius to be buried in Ireland, which verses are thus:

Hi tres in Duno tumulo tumulantur in vno, Brigita Patricius, atque Columba pius.

Maidolphus or Maidultus Scotus, as Gesnerus termeth him, did flourish in the yeare of our Lord five hundred foure score and nine, he writ De Paschatis obseruatione, whom I take to be Maidolphus, who was notable learned in the Greeke and Latine, first a scholemaster, and after abbat of Maidulphurie called in the beginning Maidulphi curia, or Maidulphurie, after the name of this Maidolphus, who as hath Lesseus lib. 4. pag. 137. did flourish in the yeare of Christ seven hundred and firstene. Now it is certaine both by our and the Scottish chronicles, that Maidolphus the builder of Maidulphurie monasterie was a Scot.

Kilianus a Scot being a monke, was martyzed in Germanie about the yeare of our Lord five hundred three score and nine, as hath Gesnerus out of Bale, but Lesseus affirmeth him to liue in the government of Celsinus, which died in the yeare of our Lord seven hundred three score and two, being the thirtieth yere of his reigne. This Kilianus did write Contra peregrinos cultus, lib. 1. Gesner also out of Mat. Dresserus nameth Lecturā Kiliani super magistrā sententiarum, which peradventure might be this Kilianus the Scot.

Jonas Monachus being borne in Scotland, and the disciple of the abbat Columbanus, flourished in the yeare of Christ six hundred and thirtie, as hath Gesnerus, he writ Vitam sancti Columbani lib. 1. Vitam sancti Eustacij abbatis lib. 1.

Adamannus Coludius, being a Scot as hath Gesner out of Bale, was a monke of the apostolicall order, and moderator, ruler, or abbat of the monasterie in the Ile of Iona, who flourished in the yeare of Christ six hundred foure score and nine, and writ De locis terræ sanctæ lib. 1. De situ Ierusalem lib. 1. De pascheta legitimo lib. 1. Epistolas multas. From this mans works Bede affirmeth that he had had man's things which he inserted in his owne booke. But I much doubt whether this Adamannus were a Scot, in that he is called Adamannus Coludius, that is Adam of Coludi, which Coludi is a place in Dorsetshire belonging to the bishopricke of Dorke, and now at this daie is in English called Catwode.

Florentius (whom Scotland brought forth flourished in the yeare of Christ six hundred foure score and eight, in which yeare Eugenius the first king of Scots began his reigne) was, as hath Lesleus, notable boone, who travelling into strange countries, converted manie from paganism into Christ, leaving a most austere life in the solitarie woods, not far from Bzulchius the famous riuer in Alsatia, and built a monasterie for such religious persons as came to him out of Scotland, being after the death of Motharius by the Argentines made their bishop. He was buried in that monasterie before named, builded for his Scots. This man I take to be the same man of whom thus writeth Gesnerus: Florentius Volusenus Scotus scripsit theologica oratione sue commendationem piam & eruditam; Griphius excudit Lugduni 1539. Idem de animi tranquillitate carmen ibidem excusum 1543. & Basilæ apud Ioannem Oporinum cum pijs aliquot poetis an. 1551. Idem edidit aphorismos beatæ vitæ & dialogum de animi tranquillitate, which maie be the booke of that matter before mentioned.

Artullus.

Artullus, or Artullis a worthie gentleman, the sonne of a most noble person boone in Scotland, flourished, as hath Gesnerus out of Bale, in the yeare of Christ seuen hundred and ten, but Lesleus appointeth him to haue liued in the time of Eugenius the eight of that name king of Scotland, who as he farther saith, began his reigne in the yeare of Christ seuen hundred thre score and two, this Artullus writ De rebus mathematicis librū vnū, ad Adelmum episcopum lib. 1.

Sedulius Junior.

Sedulius Junior being bishop of the south Scots did write Statuta concilij Romæ ad sanctum Petrum habiti, and liued in the yere of Christ seuen hundred and fouretene.

Bonifacius.

Bonifacius, as hath Marianus Scotus by the witness of Lesleus lib. 4. pag. 166, being of the Scottish blood, went to Rome, from whence by pope Gregorie the second he was sent into Germanie to convert them to the faith, where he was made the first archbishop of Mentz, being called the Germane apostle, after which he was the popes legat and sent into France: In qua (as saith Lesle) Thuringis, Hessis, & Austrasionibus ad rectam religionis viam traductis, messim longè copiosissimam collegerat; after which he went againe into Germanie, & from thence into Frisia, where he was martyred in the yere of Christ seuen hundred fiftie and five, who being a monke of the order of saint Benet, did write; Epistolarum ad diuersos lib. 1. Vitam quorundam sanctorum lib. 1.

Ioannes Mailrose.

Ioannes Mailrose whom Gesnerus maketh mention to be all one with Ioannes Scotus, being the companion of Alcuinus, in the time of Charles the great: this man being skilfull in all diuine knowledges, liued in the time of Donald the first of that name king of Scotland, as saith Lesleus bishop of Ross, and also flourished in the time of Gregorie king of Scots, in the yeare of Christ eight hundred fourescore and twelue. This Ioannes Scotus after many yeares spent at Athens in the Greeke letters, was called into France by Lodouike emperor of the Romans, who besides other monuments of his learning, at the commandement of the said emperor, did turne the Hierarchie of saint Denis into Latine, besides the commentaries of Hugo de san-cto Victore, a most notable diuine. Shortly after which, the said John was sent by Charles the great into England, to Alured, or Alfred the king thereof, to congratulat so worthie a prince for the victories which he had of the Danes: who after that he had settled a perfect league betwene the French and the Scots, remained in England continuallie, intertained by Alured, of whose children he was admitted to be chiefe scholemaster and instructor.

But shortly after, professing diuine and humane learning in the monasterie of Palmesburie, to all such as would come to his lecture, he was by certaine scholars of his (whose pride and euill conditions he did sharpelie rebuke, wounded & killed pitifullie with Pugionibus, as saith Lesleus. Which John, the king of England (as I suppose) by the authority of the pope, procured to be numbred amongst the martyrs of Christ, ordaining a notable monument to be erected ouer him in the same monasterie: of whose writings and doings thus writeth Gesnerus in these words: Ioannes Mailrosius cognomine & natione Scotus, Alcuini socius, scripsit super canones Aizachelis lib. 1. Ad Carolū regē lib. 1. Versus diuersi generis lib. 1. In euangel. Mat. lib. 3. De officijs humanis lib. 8. De officijs diuinis lib. 1. Dialogum de natura lib. 1. De naturæ diuisione lib. 1. De primo rerū principio lib. 1. De eucharistia lib. 1. Commentaria scripturarum lib. 1. Homilias eruditissimas lib. 1. De German. iuxta Irenium lib. 1. Claruit anno 792, Baleus. Idem libros Dionysij Areopagite in Latinam linguam transtulit. Carmen eius ad Carolum magnum extat apud M. Dreff.

Kennethus king of Scots, who died in the yeare of Christ eight hundred fiftie & six, wrote a booke of godlie lawes which are expressed by Lesleus lib. 1. pag. 75. of whome thus writeth Gesnerus: Kennethus Scottorum rex, Alcuini regis filius, scripsit Breuiarium antiquarum legum, quibus in foris per Angliam iurisperiti vtuntur. But in that Gesner is deceiued; for we neuer read (as far as my memorie serueth) that euer the English borrowed lawes of the Scots; but contrarie, the Scots haue borrowed, & bene inforced to obvie the lawes of England, as receiuing them from the kings of this land, their superior lords: to whome they haue done their homage, although time hath now woone the same out of vse.

Kennethus king of Scots.

Claudianus Clemens, by birth a Scot & a monke, being the disciple of Bede, was companion to Albinus or Alcuinus, as saith Sixtus Senensis in bibliotheca sancta: he was verie studious in the scriptures, & skilfull in other humane knowledges, who liuing in the time of Charlemaine, in the yeare of Christ eight hundred, and eight hundred and ten, did in verse and prose write manie learned works, whereof these are knowne to be his: In pentateuchum lib. 5. In Iosua lib. 1. In Iudicum lib. 1. In Ruth lib. 1. In psalterium. In Mattheum lib. 1. In Paulum ad Galatas. De euangelistarum concordia. Contra Bonifacium Anglum, & alia multa.

Claudianus Clemens.

Beornillus bishop of the Scots, of whome thus writeth Parker in his booke of the liues of the archbishops of Canturburie: Beornillus Scottorum episcopus acerrimus verborum & sententiarum aculeus carmine scriptis, monachorum turbam laceffuit: which Beornillus was also at the counsell of Calne in Wilthire in England, about the yeare of Christ nine hundred thre score and seuentene. For Alfritha the queene procured Alfrith or Alfred earle of Mercia in England, that he should labor to haue this Beornill to be present there, which this bishop Beornill did performe, and vehementlie spake in defense of the secular priests, against the placing of monks in their houses.

Beornillus.

Alcuinus

Aemilius.

Aemilius archbishop of the Scots, being martyred, and so termed a martyr, is supposed to have written certaine homilies; he flourished as hath Gesnerus out of Bale, in the yeare of Christ one thousand and seuen, vnder the gouernment of Grime and Malcolme (the second) kings of Scots.

Malcolme.

Malcolme the second of that name king of Scots, who began his reigne in the yeare of Christ one thousand and ten, and reigned thirtie yeares, departing the world in the yeare of Christ one thousand and fortie, did write of his countrie lawes, Lib. 1. being at length slaine by his owne courtiers.

Marianus Scotus.

Marianus Scotus so called, because that he was bozne in Scotland, was a monke of the order Benedictine, who when he perceiued all the realme of Scotland to be kindeled with continuall and cruell hatred in the time of the tyrant Mackbeth, beginning his reigne in the yeare of Christ one thousand fortie and six, he forsooke his countrie, and first came vnto the monasterie of Hulda in Germanie; where for a time he continued vnder Richard the abbat (a Scot, no lesse famous for his godlinesse, than for his learning) which at the time of his coming thither, had the gouernment of the same abbete. After which, Marianus went to Mentz, and passing ouer a solitarie life by the space of thirtie yeares, in an opinion of all men for his vertue, he shortly after died, who (flourishing vnder the said tyrant Mackbeth, & Malcolme the third of that name king of Scots) did leaue behind him these works of his: Chronica ab initio mundi vsque ad sua tempora lib. 3. De concordantia euangelistarum lib. 1. De computo lib. 1. Emendationes Dionysij. Annotationes scripturarum. De cyclo paschali. Algorithmum. Breuiarium in Lucam. Epistolae hortatorias, obiit Maguntia, anno Dom. 1086.

Turgotus.

Turgotus by Gesner called deane of Durham, and by our chronicles called prior of that house, was a verie vertuous person, and after created bishop of saint Andrews, who being in life in the yeare of Christ one thousand fourescore and sixteene, in the time of Malcolme the third, surnamed Canmor, or with the great head king of Scots, did write De Scotorum regibus lib. 1. Chronica Dunelmensis lib. 1. Annales sui temporis lib. 1. Vitam Malcolmi regis, & vitam Margaretæ Angliæ reginæ. In which Gesner hath mistaken himselfe, for there was not ante Margaret quene of England manie hundred yeres after this Turgotus, vntill the latter time of king Edward the first. Wherefore it should rather be the life of saint Margaret quene of Scotland, and the wife of that Malcolme.

David Scotus.

David Scotus, of whom Gesner maketh two distinct writers one after another, first setting downe David Scotus, and next David Presbyter Scotus, this man being bozne in Scotland, was first scholemaster at Wilceburgh, who being after called into the court by Henrie the first the emperor, of whom Auentinus abbas Vrspergensis & manie others do write, was after made bishop of Bangor in Wales. This man writing the discourse of the iourneie which the emperor Henrie the first made into Italie after the pacification had betwene him and the pope about the inuestiture of bishops, did occasion William of Malmesburie to saie thus much of him in his first booke De regibus. At verò Henricus antiquis Cesaribus in nulla virtute deiection, post pacatum regnum Theutonicum præsumebat animo Italicum; rebellionem urbium subiungaturus, quæstionemque de inuestitura suo libito recisurus; sed iter illud ad Romani magnis exercitationibus peccatorum magnis angoribus corporum consummatum. David Scotus Banchorensis episcopus exposuit, magis regis gratiam quam historicum deceret accluius. He lived and propered about the yeare of our Lord one thousand one hundred and ten in the times of Edgar and Alexander (the first) kings of Scotland, & did write Henrici imperatoris in Italiam expeditionem lib. 1. Magistratuum insignia lib. 1. Apologiam ad Cæsarem de regno Scotorum lib. 1.

Richardus de sancto Victore (of whom I do not as yet find ante mention in Gesner, but in John Maior and Lesseus) lived in the yeare of Christ one thousand one hundred twentie and foure, vnder David the first king of Scotland, who being a religious person of the order of saint Augustine, and not inferior to ante diuine of his time, as well in scholasticall as other diuinitie, did set forth manie works to be read, & was buried in the cloister of saint Victor in Paris, whose monument is yet to be seene with this epitaph recited by John Maior in his memorialis:

Moribus, ingenio, doctrina clarus & arte, Puluerco hic tegeris docte Richarde situ:

Quem tellus genuit felici Scotica parui, Te sonet in gremio Gallica terra suo.

Nili tibi parca ferox nocuit, nec stamina paruo

Tempore tracta graui rupit acerba manu:

Plurima namque tui superant monumenta laboris,

Quæ tibi perpetuum sunt paritura decus.

Segnior ut lento sceleratas mors petiit edes,

Sic propero nimis it sub pia tectâ gradu.

Walter the bastard sonne of David the first of that name king of Scots by a widow sometime the wife of one Walter a Scot, was so far estranged from the vaine things of this world, that from his youth he was (as saith Lesseus lib. 6. pag. 223.) wholly consecrated to holie exercises and offices, being first inuened with the rich carionrie of saint Oswald, and after with the honorable priorie of Kirkham. But he rightlie considering with himselfe that there was nothing which did more weaken the force of vertue than riches and idlenesse, did refuse the archbishopricke of saint Andrews, and closed himselfe in a monasterie, where he remained vntill he was aduanced to be abbat of Melrose, wherevnto being so preferred, he was the author and occasion that Malcolme (the fourth of that name king of Scots, surnamed the virgin) laid the foundation of manie abbetes. This man made commentaries vpon the booke intituled the Ecclesiasticall rule, and at length being famous through manie intracles (as that age did simple suppose) he was installed amongst the number of the saints, and flourished vnder the same king Malcolme, which began his reigne in the yeare of our redemption one thousand one hundred fiftie and three, which Walter I suppose to be the same man of whom Gesnerus writeth in this sort: Gualternus Albanensis monachus scripsit de libris ecclesiæ lib. 1. claruit anno Domini 1180. Balcan.

Richardus de sancto victore.

Walter the bastard sonne of king David the first.

Thomas Liermant alias Ersilton being bozne in Scotland, was had amongst the common people in great admiration, who not being greatlie learned did by a certaine diuination (as though Apollo had spoken from the curteine) foretell things to come, but with what spirit we will not iudge, whose words obtained the more authoritie and credit, because he had foretold the fatall date of the death of Alexander the third king of Scots, which lost his life in the yeare one thousand two hundred fourescore and three. He wrote Prædictiones rerum Scoticarum rhimicis versibus, speaking most commonlie also in rime, and was therefore by the English surnamed Rhimicus, or the Rimer, living some yeares after the death of Alexander the third, for Gesner maketh him to flourish in the yeare of Christ one thousand two hundred fourescore and six.

Thomas Liermant alias Ersilton.

Epichall

Michael Medicus.

Michael Medicus, being a learned man in all philosophy, astronomie, and the other mathematicas, whereby he grew in admiration amongst the people, is twice mentioned by Gesner, a fault which I manie times find in his Bibliotheca, first pag. 607, by the name Michael Mathematicus cognomine Scotus, who flourished in the time of John Balliol king of Scots, and in the yeare of Christ 1290, being an old man, he wrote In gratia Frederici 2. imperatoris. De sphaera lib. 1. In Aristotelis meteoris lib. 4. De constitutione mundi lib. 4. De anima lib. 1. De celo & mundo lib. 2. De somno & vigilia lib. 2. De generatione & corruptione lib. 2. De substantia orbis lib. 1. De sensu & sensato lib. 2. De memoria & reminiscencia lib. 2. Contra Auerroem in meteoris lib. 1. Imagines astronomicas lib. 2. Astrologorum dogmata lib. 1. In ethica Aristotelis lib. 10. De signis planetarum lib. 1. De chiromantia lib. 1. De physiognomia lib. 1. Abbreviationes Auicennae lib. 1. De animalibus ad Caesarem lib. 1. whose booke of physiognomie was printed at Venice Anno Dom. 1503. by John Baptista Selva.

John Duns.

John Duns by some called Iohannes Scotus, and learned the subtil doctor, was so surnamed Duns of the towne of Duns, eight miles from England, who (when he was yet but a boie) was by two frier minours brought into England to Oxford, there to be instructed: for at that time not long after was there not anie vniuersitie in Scotland. By means of which two friers he was placed in a house of their profession, in which this Duns at length took the habit and order of the Franciscans, proving of a most singular wit, whereby he became a sharpe and subtil disputer, who departing from Oxford, went to Paris, being called thither by the frier minours, where when he had for some space remained, and read unto them of scholasticall matters, he traueled to Cullen, and there vntimely died in his youthfull yeares. He liued in the time of John Balliol king of Scots, which began his reigne in the yeare of Christ 1283, of which Duns all they which follow his opinions are (as faith Lellius lib. 7. pag. 250) called Scotists or Scotists as all they of an other faction are surnamed Thomists or the Thomists, after Thomas Aquinas. But now in our age it is growne to be a common prouerbe in derision, to call such a person as is senselesse or without learning a Duns, which is as much as a foole: although trulie the same cannot stand with anie reason, this man Duns being so famous for his learning as he was, who wrote manie volumes as after shall appeare. But before I come to him, I thinke it not vnfit to set downe what other haue written touching him, sith both the English, the Irish, and the Scots, do challenge him to be their countriman, borne amongst them. Thus therefore writeth Scanihurst in his description of Ireland vnder the title of the Irish writers: Iohannes Duns Scotus an Irishman borne, as in the forefront of this treatise I haue declared. Howbeit Iohannes Maior a Scottish chronicler lib. 4. cap. 16. would faine proue him to be a Scot. Leland on the other side saith, that he was borne in England. So that there shall be as great contention rise of him as in old time there rose of Homers countrie, for the Colophonians said that Homer was borne in their citie, the Cyprians claimed him to be theirs: the Salaminians aduouched that he was their countriman. But the Smirniens were so stiffelie bent in prouing him to be borne in their territorie, as they would at no hand take no naie in the matter, and thereupon they did consecrate a church to the name of Homer. But what countriman so euer this Scotus were, he was doubtlesse a subtil and profound cleark. The onelie fault wherewith he was dished, was a little spece of bawlingorie, being giuen to carpe and talunt his predecessors diuines, rather for blemishing the fame of his aduersaries, than for aduancing the truth of the controuersies. Thus much Scanihurst. Now the booke which he wrote were these: Super sententias lib. 4. Quodlibeta quoque lib. 1. Sermones de sanctis lib. 4. Sermones de tempore li. 1. De cognitione Dei lib. 1. Comentarios Oxonienses lib. 4. Reportationes Parisienses lib. 4. In metaphysica quaestione lib. 12. Quaestiones vniuersaliu li. 2. Quaestiones praedicamentoru lib. 1. In analytica posteriora lib. 1. In Aristotelis physica lib. 8. In Categorias eiusdem lib. 1. Lecturam in Genesim lib. 1. De rerum principio lib. 1. Commentaria in euangelia lib. 4. In epistolas Pauli. Collectiones Parisienses. Tetragrammatum lib. 1. & alia. Claruit Anno Dom. 1308. Of whose booke thus further writeth Gesn. Iohannes Scotus sententiarum interpreti primam sacratissimam Dionysij translationem ascribunt, cum alteri cuidam Iohanni Scoto (before named, and liuing about the yeare of Christ eight hundred ninetie & two, about three hundred yeares before this Duns) Qui istu multis saeculis antecessit, & Athanis Grece didicit, accepta referri debeat. Of the death of this man see Petrus Crinitus lib. 24. cap. 11. De honesta vita, where he affirmeth that this Duns did turne the hierarchie of S. Denis out of Greeke into Latine.

Thomas Warreite or Warreite flourished at the battell of Otterburne, which was in the yeare of Christ one thousand three hundred eightie and eight, in the time of Robert the second of that name king of Scots, at what time the English were put to the worst. This man vpon this victorie did compose manie things in Latine rime beginning in this sort: Musarefert fatum fore scriptum carmine vatam, &c. Who being maister and ruler of Beshwallie, is not greatly esteemed of the Scottish historiographers. Gesnerus referreth the time wherein he liued, to the yeare of Christ one thousand two hundred and ninetie, which is almost a hundred yeares before that, in which the histories of Scotland make anie mention of him.

William Elphinstone being borne in Scotland was a great learned man, but because I do find one hundred and fortie yeares difference touching the time wherein he liued, set downe within three or foure lines the one of the other by Gesnerus, I will saie nothing of him, but onelie verbatim set downe the words of the same author in this sort. Gulielmus Elphinston natione Scotus, Albonensis episcopus, scripsit antiquitates Scotorum, & conciliorum statuta librum vnum. Claruit anno Domini 1480. Laudat hunc valde Bostonus Buriensis in magno scriptorum catalogo, ob singularem eruditionem. Vixit circa annum 1340. Thus much Gesnerus.

James Steward the first of the name of James, being brought vp in England as a person estranged from his native soile, is by Gesnerus said to haue bene by some called Robert the third, which can not be so; for he that was so named was John Steward, and not James. This man in the time whilst he remained in England, being a kind of banishment from his owne countrie, did compose one booke of verses, and manie other songs, he being both a learned diuine, philosopher, and musician, who was in the end slaine of his owne people, in the thirtieth yeare of his reigne, falling in the yeare of our Lord God one thousand foure hundred thirtie and six.

Iohannes Maior borne in Scotland, whom Sixtus Senensis in his Bibliotheca sancta doth (not rightlie) call an Englishman, was brought vp in Oxford, where attaining to sufficient learning, he went into France for the obtaining further knowledge ledge, and applied his studie in Paris, where he followed and professed diuinitie, as appeared by his owne woorkes. He was bozne at Haddington in Scotland, as appeareth by Gesnerus, of whome he is named Iohannes Maior Haddingtonensis, he did write Decisiones sententiarum lib. 4. Sophisticalia Parisiensia, Placita theologica, Commentarios in Mathæum, Historiarum maioris Britannia lib. 6. Caxtonum Anglum transtulit lib. 7. He flourished at Paris, as hath Gesnerus, in the yeare of Grace one thousand five hundred & twentie, under James the first king of Scots, vnto whome he dedicated his storie of Britaine, concerning England and Scotland. There is one John Spator vouched and aledged in Crisopasso Ioan. Eccij, which I do take to be this man. And Sixtus Senensis in his Bibliotheca sancta amongst the writers of the bible doth speake of one John Spator in this manner: Iohannes Maior Anglus scripsit in quatuor euangelia scholastica postillam, and liued in the yeare of Christ one thousand and foure hundred, being an hundred and twentie yeares before the time appointed by others, and by Spator himselfe therein he should liue. Of which Spator Buchanan hath verie scoffinglie set downe these foure verses here vnder written as followeth:

Cum scateat nugis solo cognomine Maior, Nec sit in immenso pagina sana libro, Non mirum titulus quod se veracibus ornat, Nec semper mendax fingere Creta solet.

William Gregor.

William Gregor bozne in Scotland, and student in Paris, where he professed diuinitie, did liue, as saith Bibliotheca sancta, in the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred and seuentene, and also, as hath Bibliotheca Gesneri in the yeare of our Lord one thousand five hundred twentie and seuen. He left manie books behind him which he had carefullie and learneblie written, whereof these are the titles: De duplici potestate lib. 1. Elucidationes sententiarum lib. 4. Quaestiones vesperales lib. 1. In politica Aristotelis lib. 8. De triplici animæ potentia lib. 1. De regno Christi aeterno lib. 1. De triplici principatu lib. 1. De scripturæ sensibus lib. 3. Ad vocabulæ theologici lib. 1. Collectiones Sorbonicas lib. 1. De disciplina Iuniorum lib. 1. De sacra synaxi lib. 1. In psalterium commentarios lib. 1. Sermones in euangelia & epistolas per circuitum lib. 2.

Hector Boetius.

Hector Boetius of Dundee in Scotland, was a learned and an eloquent historiographer, whose stile in manie parts goeth beyond the truth of times, places, and persons in his Scottish historie. He flourished in the yeare of Christ one thousand three hundred twentie and six, vnder James the first king of Scots, of whome I will saie no more, but set downe Gesnerus woords: Hector Boetius Deidonnatus, natione Scotus, scripsit catalogum regum Scotia. Descriptiones eiusdem regni lib. 1. Historias Scotorum lib. 17. Aberdonensium pontificum vitas, eius historia Scotorum excusæ sunt Parisijs, anno 1556: earundem historiarum à prima gentis origine cum aliarum & rerum & gentium illustratione non vulgari lib. 19. Duo postremi huius historiae libri nunc primum emittuntur in lucem. Accessit & huic editioni eiusdem Scotorum historiae continuatio per Ioannem Ferretium Pedemontanum recens & ipsa scripta & edita sol. Parisijs apud Iacobum Dupuys 1580.

Gawine Dowglas.

Gawine Dowglas, bozne of the noble house of the Dowglases in Scotland, being of a rare wit and learning, was made bishop of Dunkeld; who for contention betwene him and the gouernour of Scotland, forsooke his countrie and fled into England, where he died at London, in the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred twentie and one, in the time of James the first of that name king of Scots, who in his life time did write Palatium honoris lib. 1. Aureas narrationes lib. 1. Comedias aliquot lib. 1. De rebus Scoticis lib. 1. Transtulit in patrium sermonem Aeneidos Virgilij lib. 12.

Dauid Lindsay of the mount of hill, otherwisse by his office of principall herald of the realme of Scotland, surnamed Lion, was both a knight and a learned person, as may appeare by his woorkes written in his owne tong in verse, which were Acta suæ temporis lib. 1. De mundi miserijs lib. 1. Tragedia Davidis Beton lib. 1. Testamentum cardinalis Beton lib. 1. as hath Gesnerus (if that booke and the tragedie of Dauid Beton cardinal be not all one) Testamentum psalici lib. 1. Dialogus aulici & experientia lib. 1. Somnium Davidis Lindsey lib. 1. Deploratio mortis reginæ Magdalene lib. 1. Of most of which his woorkes Gesnerus maketh no mention, although that he affirme that he flourished in the yeare of Grace one thousand five hundred and fortie, in the time of James the first king of Scotland, with whome in his youth this Lindsay was brought vp, and whome he after painfullie serued in the court.

Patrick Hamilton, bozne of the noble familie of the Hamiltons, being the nephew of the earle of Arrane by his brother, was (as saith Lesleus lib. 9. pag. 427) Abbas Fenensis, who hauing applied his time in studie in Germanie, and followed the doctrine of Luther, did returne into Scotland, was after by the bishops condemned for an heretike, and burned in the yeare of our Lord God one thousand five hundred twentie and eight, as haue Gesnerus and Bale in the time of James the first of that name king of Scots. He wrote diuerse books, amongst which were these, De lege & euangelio lib. 1. De fide & operibus lib. 1.

Johannes Altus, so called by Gesner, being a Scot bozne, had some contention with one Cusdan Porphet, to whome he did write in verse a sharpe and rebuking apologie which contained one booke; besides which also he did write another booke Contra Antiscotum of this Porphet, & Epigrammata lib. 1. He liued in the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred and thirtie vnder James the first.

John Bellendon or Wallentine, who flourished in the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred thirtie and six, vnder king James the first, translated Hector Boetius out of Latine into Scottish and English, and wrote the description of Albanie or Scotland.

John Mouran being a canon regular, hauing applied himselfe to the studie of diuinitie, wherein he much profited, did write in his owne language Catechismus fidei lib. 1. and liued in the yeare of our redemption one thousand five hundred fortie and six, and in the fourth yere of the reigne of Marie quene of Scots.

John Herrison a Scot, liuing in the yere of our saluation one thousand five hundred fortie and eight, being the first yere of Marie quene of Scots, did applie his time in the studie of diuinitie, and wrote, De amplectanda in christiana religione concordia lib. 1. which was written to Edward Seymour duke of Summerset protector of England.

John Packebate called in Latine Ioannes Machabæus, being descended of a noble familie of the Scots, did follow his studie in matters of diuinitie; who flourishing in the yeare of our Lord God one thousand five hundred and fiftie, being the eight yere of the reigne of Marie quene of Scots, did compose, De vera & falsa ecclesia lib. 1.

John Packebate bozne in Scotland, did flourish in Germanie in the yere that the word became flesh both one thousand five hundred fiftie and eight, being the sixteenth year of the reigne of Marie quene of Scots: This man, whome Gesnerus supposeth might fortune to be the same John Maketh before touched, did write Anglorum ecclesiarum originem & progressum lib. 1. Explicationem suae fidei lib. 1.

George Buchanan.

George Buchanan an Irish Scot, greatlie learned, but manie times maliciouslie affected, and that so vehementlie, as that he would not forbear in the highest degree of malice to upbraid and backbite euerie person and nation which had offended him, as male appeare by his inuictible speeches, not beleeving a man of his learning, was schoolmaster to James the first of that name king of Scotland, of whom living in the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred three score and nine, I will forbear to saye what I could, least I might offend in that which I write in him, & therefore will onlie set down what Gesner hath written of him. Georgius Buchananus Scotus rudimenta grammatices Latinae Thomae Linacri ex Anglico sermone in Latinum vertit: ea Nicoh. John Knoles

John Knoles borne in Scotland, a great enimie to the Romane religion, was sometime remaining in England as banished from Scotland, after being returned home he preached at the coronation of Charles James, the first of that name king of Scotland, and wrote manie bookes in the Scottish English, amongst which were Ad Londonienses & alios lib. 1. Ad euangelii professores lib. 2. Qualiter sit orandum lib. 1. Contra missam papisticam lib. 1. Doctrina missalium lib. 1. De fide eucharistiae epistola 1. Ad ecclesias afflictas epist. 1. Ad Scotiae reginam Mariam epist. 1. Concilium in his angustiis epist. 1. Bucinae afflatum primum lib. 1. Appellationem a sententia cleri lib. 1. Ad populares Scotiae libri vnum. He lived in the yeare of Christ 1569.

John Langeie

John Langeie a Scot borne, following his studie in Paris became a Sorbonicall doctor, who living in the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred three score and ten, did write a booke of the life, doctrine, and death of Martin Luther and John Calvin, and of manie other ministers of the new gospel (as he scoinefullie termed it) which bookes were out of French turned into Latine, and latelie into the Germane tongue, printed in 4 at Ingelsfide in the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred foure score and two.

John Durie.

Iohannes Durus or Durie, whom Gesner calleth Bureus, being borne in Dumfermling, and the son before he was abbat of the abbat of Dumfermling brother to the lord of Duries, was brought up in Paris and Louan, after which he became a priest, and then a Jesuit, who now living did in the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred foure score and foure, write a booke which was intituled Confutatio repositionis Iohannis Whitakeri, ad rationes decem quibus fretus Edmundus Campianus Anglus Iesuita certamen Anglicanae ecclesiae ministris obtulit in causa fidei: which booke was printed at Paris in 8 by Thomas Brunelius, In clauso Brunello sub signo oliuae.

Patrick Adamson.

Patrick Adamson living in the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred three score and thirteene, did write certaine verses, whereof this was the title and effect, as hath Gesnerus, Patricii Adamsoni gratiarum actio illarum & potentiss. principi Elizabethae Angli. Franc. & Hiberniae reginae, propter liberatam civili seditione Scotiam, & redactam munificentiam Edinburgi arcem sub fide regis carmen elegiacum, which man being now living, is archbishop of saint Andrews.

Patrick Cockburne.

Patrick Cockburne borne in Scotland, and flourishing in the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred & fiftie, in the time of Marie quene of Scots, did write, De vilitate & excellentia verbi Dei, which was printed at Paris by Michael Jezandate, and Robert Craucion, in the yeare of our Lord one thousand five hundred fiftie and one. He wrote also De vulgari sacrae scripturae phrasi, lib. 2. whereof the first doth treat of the sinne against the Holie ghost, which they call irremitable or unto death: the second booke doth with great diligence and fidelitie unfold the most hard and most obscure places of both the testaments, hitherto by manie entille understood, and twice interpreted: which booke was printed at Paris by Robert Speltine in the yeare of our Lord one thousand five hundred fiftie and two in 8 chart. 13.

John Bese sometime officiall of Aberdeen, and bishop of Ross, of whom I have spoken in the continuance of the annals of Scotland, being an obstinate fauor and furtherer of the Romane religion doth yet live in the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred eightie & six, in the time of Charles James the first king of Scots, and hath written Pii afflictionum consolationes diuinae remedia lib. 1. Animi tranquilli monumentum lib. 1. De origine, moribus, & rebus gestis Scotorum lib. 10. printed at Rome.

Ninianus Winzetus.

Ninianus Winzetus, who flourished in the yeare of our Lord one thousand five hundred three score and one, in the time of Marie quene of Scots, was a fauor of the popes doctrine, and enimie to John Knoles, touching whom I will set down the words of two severall authors, whereof the one is Lelleus a Scot, and the popes and his friend, and the other is Bibliotheca Gesneri, whereof the first saith: Hae res (which was a disputation in religion) Niniano Winzeto maximam apud haereticos inuidiam conflavit, unde cum audirent illum (Ninianum Winzetum) iam apud typographum calere in libro excudendo, quo cogitabat cum Knoxio de fide violata ad nobilitatem expositulare, consilium ineunt de opere disturbando, Winzeto capiendo, typographo mulcendo. Magistratus cum satellitibus irruit in typographiam, liberos quos reperit, aufert, Iohan. Scoti typographi bonis mulctatum in carcerem abripit: sed Winzetum, quem tanto pege cupiebant, praeforibus magistratui occurrentem quod incognitus elapsus fuerat, dolent haereticum, rident Catholicum. On the other side thus writeth Bibliotheca Gesneri: Ninianus Winzetus Renfrous, S. theologiae doctor, & apud sancti Iacobi apud Scotos Ratisponae, abbas flagellum sectariorum qui religionis praetextu iam in Caesaris aut in alios orthodoxos principes excitare student, quarentes ineptissime quidem, Deo ne magis an principibus sit obediendum. Accessit velutatio in Georg. Buchan. circa dialogum, quem scripsit de iure regni apud Scotos 4. Ingolstadt ex officina typographica Davidis Sartorii, an. 1581.

Adam Blackwood borne in Scotland in Dumfermling, was brought up in Paris, where attending to manie degrees of learning, is now living, being advanced to the place of one of the chiefe counsellors of Postiers. This man hath learnedlie written manie works, amongst which are his bookes De coniunctione religionis & imperii, Funebres orationes admeralli regni Franciae, & Iacobi Stuarti primi regentis (after that Charles James the first, attained to the crowne) Scotiae. Besides which having written against the work of Buchanan intituled De iure regni, he is now in hand with a booke which he writeth against the chronicle of the same Buchanan.

land, and one who came hither into England with the earls of Angus and Mar, about the yeare of our Lord one thousand five hundred fiftie and foure, hath written manie epigrams, and amongst the rest, one inuective against the quene mother, to the king of France, which beginneth Vipera cum catulis.

James Erie.

James Erie did (as hath Lesleus lib. 10. pag. 587) go to Rome, after which he became a companion of the Iesuits, who coming to Paris, travelled by writing with his elder brother being a baron, to forsake the doctrine of Caluin; he flourished in the yeare of our Lord one thousand five hundred threescore and one, vnder Marie quene of Scots, and did write Ad fratrem epistola 1. Responso ad Knoxium lib. 1.

Charles James.

Charles James the first of that name king of Scots now liuing, a toward yong prince, and one well furnished with the gifts of nature and learning by birth and instruction, did in his yongest yeares about the age of seuentene or eightene, write a booke of verses in his mother tong, containing manie matters of sundrie rare inventions, and of sundrie sort of verses both learned and eloquent, which booke was after published to the world; whom I haue here placed the last in this catalog of Scottish writers, to the end that I would close by the same title with no lesse honorable and rare person, than I first made entrance thereinto: and therefore beginning with a king, I thought good also to knit it by with a king.

Thus setting end to my travels touching Scotland (which I haue not performed as the maiestie of an historie required), but as my skill, helpe, & intelligence would permit: I desire this reader to take it in good part, remembering that Vltra posse non est esse, with according to our old prouerbe, A man cannot pipe without his pipe lip. For being denied furtherance (as in the beginning I said) both of the Scots & other of mine owne nation, and thereby not hauing any more subject wherupon to worke, I can do no more than set downe such things as come to my knowledge. And therefore contenting my selfe with this, that In magnis voluisse sat est; I commit my selfe and my labors to thy favorable iudgement, who measuring my meaning with the square of indifferencie, and pardoning all imperfections in these my first labors, in respect of the shortnesse of time to performe the same (for I protest to thee that both the historie of England and Scotland were halfe printed before I set pen to paper to enter into the augmentation or continuation of any of them, as by the inserting of those things which I haue done made well appeare) thou shalt encourage me hereafter vpon more lesure, and better studie, to deliuer to the world rare matters of antiquitie, and such other labors of mine (Ab sit verbis philautia) as made both thew the discharge of my dutie to God, to my countrie, to my prince, and to my friends. For though I make same to be sole, yet I fate with Scipio, Nunquam minus sum otiosus quam cum sum otiosus.

Post tenebras lucem, sed nondum hora.
